SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Our Holocaust legacy: can it be maintained?

Dr. Michael Gordon

The 70th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz has come and gone. There were memorials around the world, with a primary ceremony at the camp itself, attended by world leaders or their delegates. In Canada, there were remembrance events, one of which I attended at Baycrest Centre, the place where, over my almost 40 years there, my patients' stories exposed me to their personal sagas of horror and survival.

I knew little about the Holocaust during my developmental years. My grandparents were immigrants to the United States from the preceding era – that of pogroms, when many eastern European Jews, especially from Russia or – as in the case of three out of four of my grandparents – from Lithuania, left their strife-ridden homeland for the mystically welcoming shores of America. Their life wasn't easy during this massive immigration: I heard many of the stories directly from my maternal grandmother who lived with me and helped raise me. She, like many others, managed to get an education, find a place to work and ultimately raise a family.

That immigrant population forged what became part of the vibrant population of America, with strong pockets of Jewish culture and creativity in the major cities. New York, which was my home, was a beacon for many. It was during my childhood, after World War II ended, that I met Holocaust survivors, through my grandmother's involvement in a Yiddish choir in which she performed.

We went on a summer vacation to a farm owned by an eastern European Holocaust survivor where there was a reunion of other survivors from neighbouring shtetls who also sang in the Yiddish choir. I became aware that, except for my grandmother, all the other guests had pale blue numbers tattooed on their arms. Two things, however, I recall most vividly. One was how the young daughter of the farm's owner taught me to catch flies with a sideways swoop of my hand,

> I fear that without the first hand witnesses, the power of the Holocaust will gradually fade into the annals of history after which she would release them into a spider's web and watch the magic of a spider ensnaring its prey. The other was the boisterous and energetic singing of songs in Yiddish and Russian every evening.

It took many years of travel and study, and ultimately my first visit to Israel, for me to have any medical contact with Holocaust survivors. In 1964, as a medical student from Dundee Scotland, I spent a month in the obstetrics and gynecology department of Rambam Hospital in Haifa, under the tutelage of a professor, Aharon Peretz, who – although I did not know this – was a critical witness at Adolf Eichmann's trial.

The professor's testimony makes chilling reading. Prof. Peretz allowed me accompany him to a clinic where he examined Holocaust survivors and determined if their obstetrical or gynecological disorders could be attributed to their Holocaust experience and thereby qualify them for financial reparations – which, according to Prof. Peretz "every one of these people qualify" for. Most patients had pale blue numbers on their arms if they were in concentration camps.

Over the years at Baycrest, I have heard the vivid stories of scores of survivors. During the past decade, most of the patients I have seen were child survivors of the Holocaust. But they are reaching the last period of their life. There will be diminishing numbers who will keep the memory alive, but their families will not likely forget their legacy. But I fear that without the first-hand witnesses, the power of the Holocaust will gradually fade into the annals of history, always important to the Jews of the world, but less so to others, for whom the powerful human tragedy will become distant and increasingly impersonal. ■

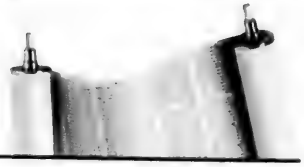
Tetzaveh | Exodus 27:20 - 30:10



Yacov Fruchter observes leadership lessons, from Moses to Mordechai
Rabbi Shalom Spira examines what it means to publicize a miracle
Rachael Turkienicz considers the role of fashion in the Torah

Yacov Fruchter

The Torah portions that we have recently read and will soon read highlight three lessons that were meant for leaders, but are relevant and inspirational for us all.

Yitro notices that his son-in-law Moses is spending day and night answering all the questions and settling all the disputes that his people bring to him. Yitro teaches him that you can't do it alone. By assuming the entire burden of the Jewish People upon yourself, you and the nation you lead will be worn down. Power and responsibility are meant to be shared. Moses heeds Yitro's advice and delegates power.

In this week's portion, Aaron the high priest is instructed to wear the choshen, a chest plate bearing 12 stones, representing the 12 tribes of Israel, whenever he would approach God in the Mishkan (tabernacle). The commentator Sforno explains that having the choshen pressed up against his heart would inspire the high priest to pray for the welfare of the entire nation. Though he only wore it in moments of worship, the verse describes the high priest as bearing the judgment of the people in his heart, always. A leader can never ignore the needs of those he or she is responsible for.

Finally, next week, we'll be reading a synthesis of these two lessons in Mordechai's timeless challenge to Esther, when she resists his request to approach Achashverosh on behalf of the Jewish People. "If you remain silent at a time like this, delivery and relief will come from somewhere else, but you will be forgotten. Perhaps for this exact moment you arrived to your royal position." (Esther 4:14)

Esther responds by instructing the Jews in her city to join her in fasting for three days. She takes responsibility for her people, but shares the power to change their destiny by uniting them in action. At certain moments, we don't have the luxury to wait for another to step in, nor can we achieve greatness on our own. May the joy of Purim open our hearts to those who need us most. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"V'nishma kolo" – "and his sound shall be heard" (Exodus 28:35). Ba'al ha-Turim observes that the word v'nishma appears thrice in Scripture: here regarding the Temple service, in Exodus 24:7 regarding Torah study, and in Esther 1:20. Ba'al ha-Turim links the three references by pointing to the Gemara, Megillah 3a, which derives from Esther 9:28 that we should cancel both the Temple service and Torah study on Purim in order to hear the Scroll of Esther, because pirsumei nissa (publicizing the miracle) enjoys priority.

Accordingly, Mishnah Berurah (Orach Chaim 689, se'if katan 18) expresses dismay that the custom of graggering has risen to such prominence that it risks drowning out the Esther reader's audibility. Perhaps we can suggest the following charitable justification.

The Gemara, Shabbat 88a, reports that whereas at Mount Sinai the Jews accepted the Torah out of awe, on Purim the Jews re-accepted the Torah out of love. Further, the Gemara, Megillah 6a, derives from Zechariah 9:7 that Roman theatres and circuses will eventually be employed by Jews for spreading Torah study.

Elsewhere, the Gemara, Makkot 24a, observes that a characteristic of the Roman Colosseum is that its cheering crowds can be heard from a great distance. Rabbi Akiva comments regarding this cacophony that "if such is the jubilance that transgressors of the Will of the Holy One, blessed be He, enjoy, then how much more so will be the jubilance of those who actually follow His Will."

Thus, on Purim, when we celebrate the re-acceptance of the Torah, we imbue the synagogue with a stadium-like character where we jubilantly cheer to express thanksgiving for the gift of the Torah. Of course, this is purely a philosophical insight, and it remains our legal duty to follow Mishnah Berurah's guidance by listening carefully to every word of Esther. ■

Rachael Turkienicz

In this week's Torah portion, there is a description of the clothes that the high priest is to wear. It becomes obvious that the man will almost disappear in the clothes.

Every layer has significance and the outcome is a multi-sensory experience. In ancient Israel, the high priest is seen at a distance and heard approaching as there are bells on his hemline. Clearly, the person in the clothing represents the office and does not impose personal creativity onto his position. I do not want a creative high priest.

However, as the office of the high priest declined, the role of the rabbi came to the forefront. Today, rabbis dress to reflect the communities they represent. We watch what they wear, if even on a subconscious level. But was that always the case?

In the Talmud, the sages discuss what to wear when they go to pray. Yes, that age-old question: "What do I wear to shul?" is truly age-old.

Yet there is difference between how we ask the question and how they asked the question.

Today, we wonder how others will view us in the outfits we wear. When did I wear it last? Is it fashion-appropriate? Am I overdressed? But in the Talmud, the focus was how my clothing enhances or detracts from my prayer statement. If I'm dressed lavishly, can I ask God for worldly goods? One sage offered the opinion that his prayers focused on the world's needs rather than personal need. If the world was at peace, he'd dress beautifully, to reflect the optimism and gratitude he wished to communicate in his prayer. If the world were in dire need, he dressed to reflect that need.

In the Torah, the clothes reflect the office. In the Talmud, the clothes reflect the prayer. Perhaps we should revisit the question of what to wear to shul and bring it to a meaningful place. ■

Belgian museum opens people's eyes

TOBY SALTZMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Beyond its brutal past, Mechelen is a scenic and lively city bustling with cafes, shops and outdoor markets. TOBY SALTZMAN PHOTO

Europe these days is rattled, its political institutions on high alert and its Jewish communities reeling with angst as security steps up at key locations. As newscasts portray events, and world leaders speak of snagging terrorists and trying to change the mindsets of youths who may be swayed to do harm, my mind veers to Mechelen, Belgium.

In this ethnically diverse city located halfway between Brussels and Antwerp is a museum that aims to open people's eyes to conditions that provoke human rights violations, and render the Holocaust relevant today by exposing how irritated masses, perpetrators and quiet bystanders can ultimately create victims.

Flanking both sides of a river that streams to the vital port of Antwerp, Mechelen is architecturally pretty, the embellished Flemish façades of its historic buildings facing wide squares and boulevards, many lined with stylish shops and cafés. Some structures date to times when Holy Roman Empress Maria Theresa of Austria built Het Hof Habsburg in 1756 as kazerne (barracks) for her infantry. (Interestingly, the empress was infamous for her anti-Semitic idols.)

When the industrial revolution whistled into Belgium – stringing continental Europe's first railroad from Brussels to Mechelen in 1835 – the city became a prominent manufacturing hub. After World War I, Het Hof Habsburg was renamed Kazerne Dossin after triumphant Austrian Gen. Emile Dossin. It became a prestigious training school for Belgium's future military officers.

Between July 1942 and September 1944, the Nazis would choose their kazerne as a convenient assembly depot for Jews from Belgium and Northern France who would be summoned for labour mobilization, not suspecting the "final solution."

Ultimately, here around 25,500 Jews and 352 Roma were thrust into 28 rail transports bound for Auschwitz-Birkenau. The Nazis' explicit records note that 583 people escaped.

One of them was Joseph Peretz who penned his experiences in his memoir The Endless Wait, and lives in Toronto today. Peretz's remarkable saga encompasses his childhood in Antwerp, his happy antics as a handsome officer-in-training in Kazerne Dossin, his multiple escapes from incarcerations in France and Belgium, and the joyous love story of his marriage to Josie and birth of daughter Kitty. [Sadly, Josie died a month ago. Peretz turned 94 on Jan. 29.]

There was no train in sight on the day I visited, yet – touching my toe to the rail that curves past Het Hof Habsburg – I imagined the rail rumbling with terror as trains rolled into Mechelen at the height of Belgium's occupation during World War II.

Stepping into the courtyard where budding soldiers once practised military strategies, I imagined rows of families clinging together, parents and children wearing tags numbered for transport cars, their possessions hurled aside. Bile curled up inside me when my guide explained: "This entire three-storey building block languished until the 1980s when a section was turned into condominium lofts. Everyone in Mechelen knew what had happened here, yet later buyers 'pretended' they had no idea."

Today the rest of the infamous edifice is the Museum of Deportation and Resistance. Literally a witness to history, it houses a Holocaust research data base brimming with the Nazis' own meticulous documentation of every Belgian who entered Kazerne Dossin in preparation for annihilation. Among the few who returned to Mechelen, the late Natan Ramet was a driving force in the creation of the museum. He was knighted by King Albert II in 2005.

Across the way stands the new Kazerne Dossin Memorial, Museum and Documentations Centre on Holocaust and Human Rights built in 2012, its pathway marked by a parade of towering poles with banners showing faces of people. Upon entering the building – where a three-storey interior wall shows more than 18,000 faces of lost Mechelen residents, along with spaces for people to add missing pictures – visitors learn the grave consequences of complicit bystanders who "followed orders" and the worth of valiant activists who formed the Jewish resistance.

Kazerne Dossin's exhibits, artifacts, cartoons, sculptures and videos speak of global concerns, among them issues of refugees, Chinese dissidents, genocide in Africa and Armenia, as well as discrimination based on race, gender and sexuality.

Beyond the museum's solemn stature, Mechelen is delightful to explore, its river boardwalk, main squares and cafés lively with a cosmopolitan mix of people whose chatter mingled English, French and Flemish dialects, all reflecting a peaceful sense of integration. Wandering through a labyrinth of narrow streets, I arrived at a market that seemed a world unto itself: most of the merchants and shoppers had olive-coloured skin and spoke a different language; the women wore headscarves.

My guide explained, "These are Muslims from Morocco who live in clusters scattered throughout Belgium. They dominate our Sunday market." Imbibing the scenes and scents as I strolled among the stalls, I felt comfortable, with no sense foreboding the events of today.

Mechelen may not headline itineraries for people eager to experience Belgium's resplendent historic sights and new museums in Brussels and Antwerp, the poignant war commemorative sites in Ypres, the scenic canal-side enclaves of Ghent and Bruges, or the gorgeous Ardennes wilderness, but it's worth a side trip for Kazerne Dossin. ■

A.B. Yehoshua: only a national unity government can head off a binational state

elevy@cjnews.ca

The great Israeli writer A.B. Yehoshua, was born in Jerusalem to a father whose family had lived in Israel for six generations and a mother of Moroccan origin.

This brilliant novelist, whose work has been published throughout the world and translated into 35 languages, is a tireless advocate for rapprochement between Israelis and Palestinians. He has received some 15 respected international literary awards, and in 1995, he received the prestigious Israel Prize, the highest honour awarded by the state to Israelis who have distinguished themselves in a specific field.

What do you think about the current Israeli electoral campaign?

It's a dirty, contemptible campaign that's a disgrace to Israeli democracy. The political situation in Israel today reminds me of the one in France in the 1950s. The government fell every year. France was facing a big problem that seemed unsolvable: French Algeria. Today we are living in a similar situation in Israel. The government coalitions in power never manage to finish their mandate. And the Palestinian question is the French Algeria of Israel.

What are the main issues in these elections?

The major problem Israel is facing today is the Palestinian question. So, I hate the fact that in this campaign, the principal political parties have been avoiding this question that's so crucial for Israel's future. All the other problems are secondary. The very sensitive Palestinian question has poisoned the daily lives of Israelis for several decades. As for the main source of this infernal problem, the policy of settlement in the Palestinian territories, it's a scourge that is eating away at Israeli democracy.

According to the most recent polls, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is the political leader best positioned to form the next government. I guess this perspective doesn't thrill you.

For me, absolutely the only path that Israel can possibly take for a frontal attack on the big problems and the many insistent threats facing it today is a national unity government. In Israel, this is an option that has proven successful in the past. I hope that this time, Netanyahu will not categorically exclude this sensible political option.

If he wins the election, the other political option Netanyahu would have would be to re-establish a government coalition with the parties on the extreme right and the religious parties.

A new alliance with nationalist extremists like Naftali Bennett, leader of Habayit Hayehudi (the Jewish Home party) and the opportunistic and obtuse religious parties will lead us right to another impasse that will be catastrophic. The major priority of this potential new government coalition of the extreme right will be to briskly pursue the settlement of the West Bank and to build hundreds of new homes in east Jerusalem – a disastrous policy that will further poison the already terrible, messy relations between the Netanyahu government and the Obama administration. This awful policy will be a fatal blow to the two-state solution and to relations between Israel and the United States.

Do you still firmly believe in the two-state solution?

There is no other way to ensure a secure and viable future for the State of Israel. I am an old Zionist, born in Jerusalem during the British Mandate of Palestine. I lived during some very hard times when Israel's existence was seriously threatened. This is the first time in my life that I have heard a political leader, Naftali Bennett, declare publicly that "there will never be peace with the Palestinians or with the Arab world." It's frightening. Even in 1948, when Israel was a very vulnerable embryonic state threatened with annihilation by seven heavily armed Arab armies, no political Zionist leader, on the right or the left, ever declared that peace with the Arabs is nothing but an impossible dream. Even in the Zionist revisionist movement, there has never been this kind of fatalism. We have to remember that Zionism has never been a synonym for defeatism. The late prime minister Menachem Begin, a leading figure in the ultra-nationalist, Zionist right, never made such appalling statements. On the contrary, Begin believed in peace with the Arabs.

Last fall, with some other Israeli intellectuals, you supported recognition of a Palestinian state by the European parliaments. Isn't that kind of European initiative idealistic and counter-productive when we know that an independent Palestinian state will never see the light of day through the goodwill of the Europeans, but only through direct negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians?

That petition was signed by almost a thousand activists in the Israel peace camp: writers, including Amos Oz, David Grossman and myself; artists; university academics; former senior Israel Defence Forces and Israeli intelligence officers, and former senior officials. Everyone knows that this symbolic recognition will not have any concrete results on the ground. The Palestinian state, if it sees the light of day, will be the fruit of the necessary negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians. We encouraged this initiative of the European parliaments, because we are convinced that, in the dismal context of politics in Israel and Palestine today, it's the only way to ward off the disastrous option of a binational Israeli-Palestinian state and to encourage the moderate elements of the Palestinian Authority to return to the negotiating table. If not, it will be the most radical Palestinians who will take charge, and they will end up eliminating any hope of peace. The binational state is a very bleak scenario that's becoming more plausible every day. In supporting the European parliaments' efforts to officially recognize a Palestinian state, those who signed the petition were not only performing a moral and existential act for the Palestinians, but also for the Israelis.

Do you believe then that a binational state is the antithesis of the Zionist plan?

Absolutely. In this kind of two-headed state, the Israeli Jewish identity is doomed to extinction. Today, many Palestinians, exasperated by a future that is likely to be darker and darker, secretly dream of living in a binational state. We need to put an end to this macabre dream. Time is against Israel.

How can one restart a peace negotiation process that's stalled today?

Let's not fool ourselves. The interminable conflict between Israel and the Palestinians cannot be resolved without the help of the Europeans and the firm intervention of the Americans. The likelihood that this more than 100-year-old dispute can be definitively settled through direct negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians is very minimal. The United States is primarily responsible for the perpetuation of this conflict. Since 1967, when Israel occupied the West Bank and the Gaza Strip after the Six Day War, the governments in power in Washington did absolutely nothing to end the Israeli settlement of the Palestinian territories. Nevertheless, since 1967, all the U.S. presidents, Republican or Democrat, have said that the Israeli settlements are an obstacle to peace. Unfortunately, nothing was ever done about it. The negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians can't be restarted with any serious intent as long as the Americans, and the Europeans too, don't put intense pressure on the two parties, because they are giving substantial financial aid to the Palestinian Authority. ■

Emerson Swift Mahon: Canada's first black Jew

Backstory

EIRAN HARRIS

In 1912, a young black man left Grenada in a quest for learning. His voyage led him to Canada and conversion to Judaism.

"May you be written in the book of life in the New Year," says the greeting in Yiddish on the back of a photograph of a black man in a broad-brimmed hat (see picture on cover).

That man, Emerson Swift Mahon, Canada's first black Jew, sent the picture with a brief letter to Rabbi Herman Abramowitz of the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Montreal.

The letter, dated Nov. 16, 1921, is one of many treasures discovered in the Allan Raymond Collection housed at the Jewish Public Library Archives of Montreal. Raymond, a historical lecturer, retired from the insurance business to devote his time to the study and collection of Canadian and Canadian-Judaic history. Written in English and Hebrew, the letter is a fascinating glimpse of this remarkable man.

"It is to be regretted that I have neglected my study of Hebrew," Mahon wrote from Winnipeg to the rabbi. "What with the busy whirl of life...I had almost forgotten the saying of the sage."

That saying is written in Hebrew. "Whoso forgets one word of his study, him the scripture regards as if he had forfeited his life."

To be black and Jewish in Canada nearly 100 years ago was both unique and challenging. To be also literate in Hebrew and Yiddish was an indication of an unusual and determined personality.

Born a Catholic in 1891, he learned the importance of higher education from his father who was a head teacher in Grenada. His father also instilled in him the importance of the lessons to be learned from Judaism. We cannot be sure what made him interested in Judaism, but perhaps it was the influence of the Sephardi Jewish community in the West Indies, exiled from Spain during the Inquisition.

The educational facilities in the British West Indies being limited, Mahon left the islands for Canada. He farmed in Saskatchewan for two years before joining the Canadian army at the outbreak of World War I. There he met Rabbi Abramowitz, the chaplain to the Jewish soldiers of the Canadian contingent.

Mahon persuaded Rabbi Abramowitz of his sincere desire to convert, and after a lengthy course of instruction in the intricacies of Judaism, an appropriate test of knowledge and a religious ceremony, Rabbi Abramowitz signed the conversion certificate.

After the war Mahon settled in Winnipeg and graduated in 1929 with a science degree from the University of Manitoba. He later received a teacher's certificate from the Provincial Normal School. Unfortunately, the Depression forced him to accept a job as a sleeping car porter with the Canadian Pacific Railway, which lasted until his retirement in 1956.

Eventually, Mahon possessed one of the finest private Judaic libraries in Canada. At one time, he seriously considered enrolling in a theological seminary, with the intention of becoming a rabbi.

In Winnipeg, Mahon joined Young Judaea, a Zionist youth organization, and quickly rose through the ranks. His work on the railway enabled him to organize chapters throughout Western Canada as well as to photograph every synagogue between Winnipeg and Vancouver.

It is known that he married a woman of Russian-Jewish descent and that the couple had children, but the details are unknown.

His skin colour alone made him stand out at any gathering and there was hardly a Jewish person in Winnipeg who did not know him by sight. In fact, on the way to synagogue on Saturday mornings, it was quite common to observe Mahon urging his children, in Yiddish, to hurry along.

Mahon died in 1963 and his wife followed 15 years later. ■

A first for Canada.
A first for Mount Sinai.

Thank you to our nurses and community of caregivers for making Mount Sinai Hospital the first hospital in Canada to receive Magnet® designation — the highest and most prestigious international distinction for nursing excellence and outstanding patient care. Only 7% of American hospitals have achieved Magnet® status, which places Mount Sinai among the top-tiered hospitals in North America.

As we begin our journey as the new Sinai Health System — comprised of Mount Sinai Hospital, Bridgepoint Active Healthcare, the Lunenfeld-Tanenbaum Research Institute, along with affiliate Circle of Care — our nurses will play an invaluable role in building integrated models of care and helping transform the patient experience.

Adults learn too at Royal Conservatory

The Royal Conservatory School (RCS) is one of the most extensive community-based music schools in North America. With a commitment to culture and creativity, and to making music accessible to everyone, we offer a wide variety of group classes, private lessons and programs for students of all ages, levels, and artistic interests.

Specific to the adult community, the Royal Conservatory is offering a new series of music appreciation and history courses. Each course is taught by experts in their field in a welcoming and collegial environment. Class offerings are designed to deepen one's understanding and enjoyment of music across genres and historical periods, from the rich traditions of the past to exciting new creations of the present.

With courses offered in the morning, afternoon, and evening, there is sure to be something that sparks curiosity and fits into one's busy schedule. Offerings include live performances by students of The Glenn Gould School and there are specific ticket offers, too. Upcoming courses include:

Mahler's Romantic Landscape of Song and Symphony, 4-week course, Thursdays, Feb. 26 – March 19, 1:30-3:30 p.m., instructor: Stephen Cera.

This course surveys the fascinating connections between Mahler's songs and song cycles, and his first four symphonies. Special focus will be paid to Mahler's Second Symphony (Resurrection), which will be performed by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, Toronto Mendelssohn Choir, and vocal soloists in June 2015.

Music and the Third Reich, 4-week course, Tuesdays, March 3-24, 6-7:30 p.m., instructor: Simon Wynberg

Simon Wynberg, artistic director of the ARC Ensemble (Artist of the Royal Conservatory) will cover anti-Semitism and the early exclusion of Jews from the music industry, the concept of "entartete" (degenerate) music, the creation of the Reichsmusikkammer, and the predicament of German musicians and the artistic and moral choices they were forced to make.

Mozart: Man and Music, 6-week course, Tuesdays, March 10 – April 14, 10 a.m.-noon, instructor: David Bowser.

Join David Bowser, founder and artistic director of the Mozart Project and conductor of the Toronto Mozart Players, for a series of engaging and informative lectures offering insights into the life, personality, and music of this enigmatic and beloved composer.

Opera in the City, 6-week course, Tuesdays, March 24 – April 28, 1-3 p.m., instructor: Eric Domville.

Join University of Toronto professor emeritus Eric Domville for an illuminating journey into operatic history, and enhance your experience of the following four operas scheduled to be performed in Toronto this spring:

Berlioz's version of Gluck's Orpheus and Eurydice (Opera Atelier; opens April 9)

Rossini's comic masterpiece The Barber of Seville (opens April 17)

Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle and Schoenberg's seminal Erwartung (opens May 6.)

"Attending this course greatly enhances my appreciation of the operas when I attend the live performance," says a former student.

For detailed descriptions of course offerings and information or to register go to learning.rcmusic.ca/musicappreciation, call 416-408.2825, or visit us at 273 Bloor St. West.

Adult students may also explore individual and group instruction throughout the year in voice, woodwind, brass, percussion, string and piano. ■

Beth Tzedec offers kids a new way to learn Hebrew

Beth Tzedec's Congregational School in midtown Toronto isn't your mother's Hebrew school.

There's no more boring recitations of Hebrew or endless drills about Jewish holidays. Instead, principal Daniel Silverman has reformed the curriculum to reflect an experience- and activity- based model of learning.

"We're not just taking the school model and changing what subject kids learn, and doing it on off hours. We're very different then what things used to be like 20, 30, 40 years ago," he says.

"We make sure that everything that we do is centred on, not what I want my students to learn, [or] what I want the students to get, but – how are my students going to experience this? What is going to be their take [on] how I'm going to present this material to them?"

Silverman accomplishes this through physical movements, props and games so that "they are beginning to develop a Hebrew vocabulary in a purely oral way," he says.

"And so, in a few years down the road when we actually sit down with them to learn how to read Hebrew, and how to write Hebrew, the content that they're learning they already know."

> It is all happening in real time and in a relevant and authentic way

One such way assignments reflect this is through baking. The children will have an ingredient list and recipe for chocolate chip cookies in Hebrew, which they will have to correctly translate before being able to eat and distribute the baked goods.

The end result is being able to place Hebrew in context, which will be more meaningful for them.

"When they learn all this Hebrew vocabulary it isn't just in this vacuum," Silverman says. "It is all happening in real time and in a relevant and authentic way."

The kids aren't bored or staring idly at the clock, watching the seconds tick by, like you may have done in Hebrew school. Instead, the youngsters at Beth Tzedec think Hebrew school is fun.

"They are learning, but they are also learning in a way that is engaging and fun and is connecting to that subject. Not in a 'This is what you have to know' way, but in a 'here's what we think this is what you want to know.'"

Silverman does this through the support of his faculty, who are all dedicated to helping children learn in the modern world.

"Here's the 21st-century aspect of it," he says. "As a teacher, you incorporate technology, you incorporate music, you incorporate art and it makes for a really robust and full experience for all of our students."

Beth Tzedec also offers options for busy parents with children in grades 3 to 7 who may not want to fight through Toronto traffic on a Wednesday afternoon. It offers a web-conferencing class where students can log on from their own home.

"We understand that we serve a wide geographic range and people have different and busy schedules, and parent can't always get their kids to our site at a specific time," he says.

Come see for yourself at Beth Tzedec's open house at 9:45 a.m. on Sunday, March 1. ■

Students with special needs have lots of options in day schools

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish day school students with special needs or educational disabilities have many options to participate in the day school system, says Daniel Held, executive director of UJA's Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education.

The centre deals with Jewish education in day schools, supplementary schools, and programs throughout the city (including Jewish summer camps, March of the Living, Hillels, PJ Library program and more).

"The goal is engage the maximize number of students and offer high quality affordable education, to ensure the health of our community in terms of Jewish identity," says Held, who has also worked in the Jewish day school system and is a columnist for The CJN.

For students with special needs, there are a variety of options they can turn to in the Jewish community, says Held.

"Special needs is a diverse term. It encompasses students who need all kinds of different services from social work to remediation to extra time and coaching. [It also includes] students who have physical disabilities, and our schools offer a wide variety of services. Our partners at Jewish Family & Child (JF&CS) and JVS offer services in school," he said.

When a student requires special assistance, the family and school can work together to develop an individualized education program (IEP) to best serve the needs of the student. "The IEP helps guide the work of parents and the staff who work with students, recognizing that every student who works with us has multiple touch points," says Held.

The role of federation is to assist schools with the cost and expertise needed to deal with diverse students' needs.

"We help build the schools' capacity to work with students with special needs, including consulting to develop best practices. We offer funding to circumvent the cost of servicing students with special needs."

Ultimately, the goal is to have students with special needs or disabilities integrated into the main classroom for the majority of the day, he said.

Organizations like JVS often partner with Jewish day schools to work with teachers, principals, and parents every day, says Held.

Other organizations such as Zareinu, an educational centre that provides individualized therapies and treatments along with Jewish teachings and traditions, are an option for students who need specific attention for their physical or developmental challenges, he says.

As the community grows and the variety of students' needs grow as well, challenges remain.

"We do have a real diversity of learners. Resources are tight. It's challenging for schools to reach the broadest spectrum. We're undertaking reviews of IEPs to understand who the students are in our schools and we're working with each school to understand what kind of needs they have so we can better understand how we can better help the school," says Held.

He says he's hopeful about the advancements being discussed and envisioned for special needs students in Toronto.

"We held a professional development day about a month ago for those who work with students with special needs across all 14 schools in Toronto," said Held. "We came together for one day to learn together about building IEPs for special needs. It was exciting to see their passion about building the best education." ■

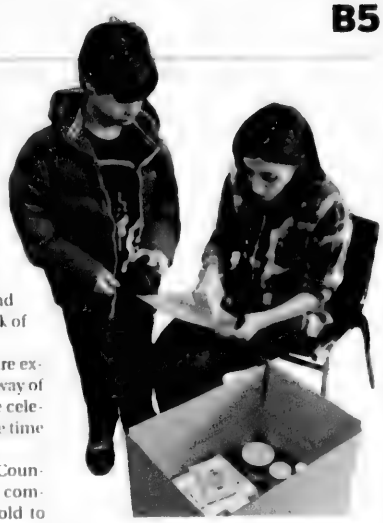
NCJW teaches spirit of philanthropy



The Passover Food Drive, a project of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section takes place this year from March 15 to 25.

Glenda Ephron Cooper, chair of the food drive, says that during this period the organization packs and delivers more than 2,600 boxes of kosher for Passover food to impoverished Jews living within Toronto.

"The number of recent immigrants, individuals with disabilities, and those with inadequate financial resources, continues to grow. It is our mission to provide these individuals with the essentials required to have a meaningful Passover seder, she says.

"Thirteen per cent of Jews live below the poverty line in the Greater Toronto Area, which amounts to almost 24,000 people. Added to this, we lose about 20 per cent when we have to spend U.S. dollars, and the cost of purchasing chickens has increased," Cooper says.

Monetary donations are vital to this cause as 90 per cent of the kosher for Passover food is purchased through wholesalers.

"The Passover Food Drive has a new look, which we are excited to launch with The Canadian Jewish News. We will also be launching a new website on March 1, www.passoverfooddrive.com.

"We are initiating some exciting fundraisers this year to supplement our donor campaign. We are announcing our first ever Passover Food Drive Raffle, Buy-A-Chicken, from March 1 to April 6. Tickets will be sold at $10 each or $25 for three. Money raised from this raffle will be used towards purchasing the chickens. Tickets may be purchased by phone, 416-633-5100."

Cooper says there are some excellent prizes: 1st prize is a travel voucher from Payless Travel; 2nd prize includes two nights stay at Best Western Hotel located on historic Lundy's Lane in a Tower Room, Clifton Hill Fun Pass for two, and Oh Canada, Eh, theatre tickets for two; 3rd prize is a Skylon Tower Fallsview dining voucher, and gift certificate at the Tango clothing boutique in Niagara Falls; 4th prize is a 60 minutes Pure and Simple facial from OM Spa; 30 minutes holistic nutritionist consultation from Nutrilicious and a beautiful necklace from Lineve Jewellery.

Other prizes include: art from Poster International; a Sobeys gift voucher; Supperworks gift certificate; seder plate from Matana; Starbucks gift basket, and three Second Cup vouchers.

Other fundraisers to help purchase chickens include, Passover greeting cards, which have been drawn and created by school children.

The drawings are designed depicting symbols and story lines relating to Passover. There will be five winners who win a Haggadah, and have their names printed on the back of their card.

"We also sell tribute cards. These are excellent for hostess cards, or an ideal way of honouring those around us who are celebrating special times and at the same time contributing to the community."

Delivery day is a hub of activity at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St., as the community gets together, young and old to deliver the food boxes to recipients, says Cooper.

The Passover Food Drive is totally volunteer based. "It is so community driven. It's an inspiration to see and be part of it."

Children come to pack on outings with their schools. High school students supervise, pack and help in the warehouse, and volunteer hour credits are given. Drivers are an essential part of the drive. They deliver the food boxes to recipients on delivery day.

"Family bonding is so part of this project. Toronto families have been doing this for 32 years. Those children are now parents of the next generation. The drive is part of the Jewish culture in Toronto."

Cooper says, "if you have never participated in the drive, come on delivery day, and feel the amazing energy at Council House. It is a marvellous learning experience for children and adults alike."

For more information regarding the raffle or to make a donation, call, 416-633-5100. You can also make an online donation by visiting: www.ncjwc-ts.org or www.canadahelps.org/dn/17133. ■

Israeli schools tougher, inside and out

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The biggest adjustment making aliyah with children may be transitioning to the Israeli school system. Schools here are run down, and the chilly reception can be a shock.

For Rebekah Chaifetz Saltzman, who made aliyah in August from New York, the transition has been jarring. From an elite Jewish school with Smartboards and iPads, Saltzman's older son transitioned into Kitah Bet (Grade 2) and her younger twins into gan (kindergarten) in Haifa's Achuza area.

"The schools here are not as nice. Technologically, they're miles behind," says Saltzman. "It's so surprising from a high-tech startup nation."

Though her son's classroom has a computer with a projector, the building is bare bones. "The kids are wearing their coats all day long in the winter. That would never happen in an American school. They have heaters in the classrooms, but when you walk in the hallways, it's cold."

"Cold" also describes their reception from students, staff and families unprepared for olim. "The adjustment was rough... They don't teach their kids how to treat new people. It's cliquish... a lot of the families, the parents, grandparents live in Haifa, all the families know each other."

But Tara Gordon Carey, who made aliyah this fall from Toronto to Pardes Chana, says it depends on the school.

Carey visited three schools. At the third, "the menahel [principal] took me to the class, the kids stood up... they showed respect." Her daughters now attend that school, which is, like Saltzman's children's, a national religious school.

Carey, whose daughters attended Netivot HaTorah Day School in Toronto, has learned that "you have to be a strong advocate in this country for your children."

Few olim plan their aliyah around a school, as Yocheved Deltoff and her husband Marshall did. Moving from Thornhill last summer, the family chose Karmiel mainly for Amichai, an independent haredi school with a reputation for warmth and experiential learning.

On their daughter's first day, Deltoff says, the teacher gave out streamers: blue and white, and red and white. "They sang a song about who is from Israel, who is from Canada. I know not all the schools here are this warm," she says.

Stephen Epstein, who moved from Toronto to Israel in 2005 and lives in Rehovot, heard two warnings about Israeli schools before he came: "There's overcrowding in the classrooms, and the teachers are underpaid."

Nevertheless, his daughters, in grades 7 and 9, are getting a great education, one in a science-based school and one in a school mixing religious and non-religious students. He says the day school system in Canada takes an unrealistic toll on family budgets, making aliyah a reasonable alternative.

Carey agrees that schools here, though run down by Canadian standards, seem to have their priorities straight. Her daughters' school, "has a huge play structure... hopscotch, ball games, colourful squares in the whole outside yard."

What Carey's kids miss most is having Sundays off to go skating or hiking. "Especially when you're shomer Shabbat, there's no family tiyul [outing] time. The only family time is Shabbat."

"I told them there's good and bad in everything. There are good things in Toronto, bad things in Toronto; good things in Israel, bad things in Israel." ■

The Israeli education system

Israel offers three streams of free public education: national, national religious, and Arab. Any Jewish student may attend either a religious or non-religious public school at no charge.

There are also independent schools, usually aimed at families willing to pay a little more for a religious education. Registered schools receive government funding. In 2011-2012 around 56 per cent of the pupils in the Hebrew education system attended state schools, about 19 per cent attended state-religious schools, and about 25 per cent were enrolled in haredi schools.

New technology prepares students for the world

VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

To succeed in today's workforce, you need to know how to multi-task across devices and learn new technology at a moment's notice.

That's why schools like Akiva School in Montreal pride themselves on staying up to date on new educational research to provide teaching strategies that will help prepare students for a workplace that perhaps can't be envisioned yet.

"We're preparing kids for a future we have not yet lived in. What's out there now is so rapidly changing. Innovative programming promoting the skills needed in today's 21st century world are key, providing experiences where students have real life, contextual learning, collaborate in teams, communicate, and reach out to build relationships outside of the school," said Jennifer Fraenkel, head of school at Akiva School, a pluralistic elementary Jewish day school in Montreal.

This school year, they launched computer science and coding classes into their curriculum, for students from kindergarten to Grade 6. "We coined it the fourth language," said Fraenkel, in addition to the three languages the students already learn (English, French and Hebrew). Coding is one of the most sought-after skills in today's workplace, with the number of computer programming jobs expected to increase 30 per cent by 2020 (meanwhile, all other U.S. industries are only expected to grow by 14 per cent).

Other Jewish day schools are also following suit. At the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, students benefit from Smart boards in classrooms and can take technology courses with access to green-screens, soundproof rooms and recording booths.

At Associated Hebrew Schools, students work with iPads in the classroom and they've also started a new volunteer initiative called iParent where parent volunteers introduce JK/SK children to different iPad apps related to numeracy and literacy activities.

At Akiva, they're also taking learning outside of the classroom. Their Grade 5 students work on entrepreneurial projects with local businesses, learning how to solve business challenges.

Indeed, Forbes reports that success in the 21st-century workplace will not be dependent on technical ability but the ability to problem solve and make decisions, something which Akiva School hopes to instil in their students from an early age.

"What kids need is to take responsibility at a young age and know they can make a difference. The only way to do this is if they know the work they're doing in school is related to work outside of school," said Fraenkel.

"It's not about sitting in a classroom and working in workbooks anymore – it's about giving them a real audience and causes and having the work they do transcend the walls of the classroom. There's lots of brain research now on what motivates students and that's doing and speaking, which we put a lot of emphasis on. That's part of the basis why Akiva was founded (in 1968) and it's pretty amazing it holds true so many years later." ■

Applying to Medical School? Law School? Dental School?

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many professional school programs, such as medicine, law, dentistry, pharmacy and business, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Since applications to professional schools have increased in the last ten years, gaining admission requires careful planning – even for students with impressive credentials. No aspect of the application process can be overlooked.

Does someone you know need help with the university application process?

Expert advice can make the process less daunting. Whether the task is helping a student plan for eventual medical school admission, critiquing application essays for U.S. dental schools, or preparing for CASPer or Multiple Mini Interviews ("MMIs"), we work one-on-one with our clients to maximize their chances of success. The result is the strongest application possible, one that highlights each student's unique character and individual strengths.

JYN Hebrew School is the best Hebrew school EVER. There are fun educational games and they teach you all you need to know about Judaism.

At the beginning of the class we do all sorts of prayers to Hashem like one of most important prayers the Shema. Next we do our mitzvot for every Hebrew letter. Sometimes we even play fun games for the mitzvot we learned, and trust me, they are fun.

Then it is snack time. For snack we have kosher cookies. The kosher cookies taste so delicious. Also when we are at break we play fun games like octopus or tag.

After we are finished our break we do a really fun program called Alef Champ. What Alef Champ really is, is a program where kids at JYN Hebrew School get to practice their alef bet in a fun way. The first two colours (red and white) teach you how to read the alef bet. The next three colours (orange, yellow and green) teach you all the vowels. The next colour (blue) teaches you how to read fast and at the end of blue you have to read a lot of Hebrew letters in under two minutes.

The last colours (purple, brown, grey and black) teach you how to read from the Torah and that means when you are done black you will know exactly how to read the Torah. Right now I am on brown and now all I need to do to pass is finish brown and then do grey and black and then I have finished all of the levels and I know how to read the Torah (which is awesome to know how to read the Torah). Alef Champ is a really cool way to learn how to read Hebrew.

Next we write in our Jewish hero book. In our Jewish hero book there are questions about the history of Judaism that we have to answer. What I mean by Jewish heroes are people like Avraham (the first Jew) and Moshe (Jew to receive the Torah). So every week we learn about one amazing Jewish hero and that means we get to do one full page about one amazing Jewish hero.

Sometimes at the end of class we do something called food art. What food art is, is an activity where we make Jewish things out of food. How cool is that! Some examples of what we made are a sukkot (made out of graham crackers, marshmallow fluff, pretzel sticks and gummy worms) and a challah (see picture at left). We made braids with the challah, baked them and then ate them MMMMMMMM. All of the food was so amazing. The next thing is the worst. It is time to go home.

See, I told you JYN Hebrew School is the BEST Hebrew school EVER! ■

Let me tell you about my time at the Peretz Folk School, in Winnipeg, Man. which was very much a humorous, varied, vital and most interesting learning experience.

Torah learning was most colourful, and I can still remember the story of Pharaoh's daughter finding baby Moses in the bulrushes on the Nile River.

Also, learning to read and write in both Hebrew and Yiddish was so meaningful for me, that to this day I love speaking Yiddish.

I began attending Hebrew school at eight years old, and being a hyperactive child, I was definitely not a sit and listen all the time student! Also, it was difficult attending Hebrew school Mondays and Wednesdays from 4:30 to 6:30 pm, after a full six hour day of public school. On top of this, I had to come home, practice my violin, do English homework and get to bed by 9 p.m.

My Hebrew and Yiddish teachers were well versed in their subject matters, and I learned to love both languages! My love of Hebrew was so strong that I elected to take Hebrew 1 at the University of Manitoba. To this day, I love singing in both languages and have done gigs at retirement homes in Toronto singing in both tongues.

Our Hebrew school had three floors. On the second floor was my classroom and on the third we had a Ukrainian/Russian caretaker who used to fry bacon and who knows what else. The strong smell of these non-kosher foods would drift down to our classroom, interrupting our Torah reading lessons. My reaction to this foul smell was an emphatic and loud "Phew"!!

Now, thinking back on my classroom disruptions, I know I was seeking attention and loved the laughter of my classmates. Of course I was punished occasionally for these disruptions and had to stand in the corner facing the wall, and this is when I most remember the smells wafting down from upstairs. Quite a strong memory even now!

Ironically, when I was in my 20s, I again met my parochial teacher, Mr. Greenberg, who smiled, remembering my loud classroom disruptions and said in Yiddish, Sarah, fune dir ken ich krign a krankan hartz! (You can give me heart failure.) Two years later, I noticed Mr. Greenberg's yahrzeit in the Jewish Post and he had indeed died of the heart failure he claimed I was going to cause him back then!

When I became a teacher and had a few kids who were disruptive to the class like I was back in my school days, I recalled my kind parochial teacher and wondered if this could be his revenge. And actually I soon realized that his kindness in handling me helped me greatly get through to these kids in my class.

In closing, I must say that the children who attended a full day Hebrew School program, seemed to have the best of both worlds. ■

The CJN asked readers to share with us how their lives were positively influenced by their Jewish education. Here are our six winners and four runners-up.

Tillie Margolis

When I was eight years old in 1932 my widowed mother enrolled me at the Borochov Shule to receive a Jewish education. The tuition fee was $1 per week. The school was located at 1 Major St., just doors from my home at number 49. Several of my friends on the street were also enrolled. Every afternoon after school we all hurried to attend the class.

Our teacher was Mr. Menachovsky, a charming and dedicated man. The shule's founders were members of the Labour Zionist Movement. These were a group of men dedicated to preserving the Yiddish language. Hebrew and the learning of Torah were not on the curriculum. Instead, we were introduced to Yiddish writers who told wonderful stories about Jewish life in the old country, giving us a picture of their struggles to survive in an anti-Semitic culture.

A highlight of the school year was the annual concert arranged by our teacher's wife, Mrs.Menachovsky. We all took part in making costumes and planning the event.

Though my Yiddish studies were to end with my class's official graduation in 1936, I continued on with them for one more year just before entering high school. The five years I attended the Borochov Shule gave me wonderful insights into my Jewish heritage and were to have a lasting effect on my life.

In 1949 I was a newlywed and looking for interests outside the home. Some friends approached me about joining Pioneer Women (now known as Na'amat). I became part of a wonderful group who were doing outstanding (and fun) work for the women and children of Israel.

Na'amat is the leading social service agency in Israel. Imagine my surprise when I learned that Na'amat was affiliated with the Labour Zionist Movement, the same organization that established the Borochov Shule where I received my Jewish education.

I was now working on committees with many of the same men I had known as the school's founders! These were individuals of intellect and dedication and included Max Federman, then head of the Fur Worker's Union, Ben Himel, for whom the Borochov Centre on Codsell Avenue is named, and Israel Appel.

In later years, the Labour Zionist Movement attracted equally forward-looking individuals, such as Julie Sokoloff, Lou Kirshenbaum, Victor Topper and Harry Steiner, among many others. They continued their dedication to education by founding the Bialik Hebrew Day School, with which Na'amat Toronto is proudly affiliated.

I myself attribute the Jewish education I acquired in my childhood and early teens to having led me to my future path in becoming active in Na'amat.

Through my involvement in the organization, I've held a succession of senior roles, first as president of Club Masada, then Toronto Council, and eventually as national president of Na'amat Canada. In addition, as president, Ontario Region, of the Canadian Zionist Federation, for several years I was in charge of running the annual Israel Day Festival, now organized and co-sponsored by Na'amat Toronto.

On May 31, 2015, Club Masada will be celebrating its 70th anniversary in Toronto in conjunction with Na'amat Canada's 90th anniversary.

On reflection, I realize just how much my early Jewish education contributed to my future role in the community. ■

When I was in kindergarten I got the strap for singing the ABC song. Why? Because you were supposed to freeze when the bell rang to enter the school, and I didn't freeze. I was in the middle of singing the ABC song, and when you're only five years old it is a source of great humour to say " El, Em, En, Oh, Pee!" But I hadn't gotten to the "Pee" part yet, and I was determined that I would say it, and so I continued to sing loud and clear, even though everyone else in the schoolyard was standing silently like you were expected to.

For this "crime" I was hauled into the principal's office for my punishment. The year was 1954, and I was a five-year-old boy attending school for the first time. The Associated had not yet moved up north (north at that time would be the Neptune Avenue school). I don't think it was even called The Associated at that time – it was known as the Talmud Torah, located on Brunswick Avenue.

Anyway, the principal at that time, Mrs. Snider, pointed out how wrong it was for me to not freeze when the bell rang, and then I saw what my punishment would be – the leather strap that she pulled out from her desk. I got smacked once on each hand, and was told never to break that rule again.

So how does this story highlight the value of a Jewish education? Well, we forget sometimes how far Jewish schools, and the public schools too, have come over the years. (When I became a teacher in 1972 it was still legal to use the strap in the public school system, even though no principal would dare use it at that point). Anyway, when I went home to tell my mother what had happened to me she wasn't horrified. She didn't call for the principal to be fired. She didn't alert the media. She simply reconfirmed what Mrs. Snider had told me – "Don't do it again." And I didn't.

Len Phillips

In those days the rules were black and white. Much of it would be unacceptable by today's standards, but the rules were clear, and there was a sense of security knowing what those boundaries were. Despite getting the strap in kindergarten I loved going to school – even now,at the age of 65, I still have vivid and fond memories of that first year in school.

The clear guidelines of what was expected in school created a safe and conducive environment to learning. Behaviour issues didn't take over class time. The emphasis was on learning, and that's where The Associated excelled. We were free to learn in an environment that wasn't really relying on fear of punishment anymore, but was focused more on the joy of learning without interruptions... even without the strap being given for singing in the yard. ■

Our goal is to engage our students.
To build character.
To prepare them for success in life.

Our programs are designed to inspire each student to value:
- Effort and achievement in Torah and General Studies
- A connection to Hashem through daily Tefila
- A connection to their fellow man through Middot, Derech Eretz and Chesed
- A connection to their world through math, science and technology

Our programs include:
- Qualified, experienced, and professional caring staff
- Full-day preschool through Junior High
- Enriched early years program
- French Studies Grades 1-8
- Extra-curricular programming

Michael Litvak

Not every family committed to Jewish education can afford to send their children to day school. Such was my case growing up in the '50s and '60s. I was educated at the supplementary Hebrew school of Beth Am Congregation on Keele Street when the neighbourhood was predominantly Jewish (Beth Am is today part of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am).

Beginning in kindergarten and studying through Grade 10 (I was part of the inaugural class of about a half dozen who continued long past bar mitzvah) I became a product of the supplementary system that my rabbi, Rabbi Michael Dolgin, likes to point out is proof that this type of learning can be successful.

Even though I was a rotten kid and tormented many of my teachers – did they really have eyes behind their heads to see us? – the message definitely did sink in. Regardless of what my outward attitude may have been, these teachers and our long suffering principal, Dr. Samuel Rosenblum, got the message across. I became proficient in reading Hebrew (probably because I conjugated so many verbs as punishment!) and learned how to daven and chant Torah. At the tender age of 13 and just post-bar mitzvah, I began to tutor bar mitzvah students of my own. I continued this until I was 21 and away at university.

Learning how to daven at a shivah came from watching others until I eventually volunteered to do so as we seemed to do back then. Years later, as shuls began to provide shivah leaders, I became a part of a team that performs this mitzvah as a member of Temple Sinai Congregation. I have been leading services now, as required, for over 20 years.

Chanting Torah has always been a particular pleasure; I can learn a parshah (or part thereof) in somewhat short notice and have been a regular Torah reader in morning minyan, at Shabbat and High Holidays for over 20 years now. It gives me a great deal of satisfaction to be told by congregants that they enjoy listening to me.

I learned how to conduct the unveiling service and now serve as the alternate to perform this duty when there is a conflict and none of our clergy can be made available.

We have raised our children in a kosher home with lots of Yiddishkeit. They all were educated at Temple Sinai's supplementary school. With my wife, Judy, who has been involved in Jewish education her entire professional career, we supported that in the home. As well, I tutored each of our six children for their b'nei mitzvah. My family calls me a 'frustrated' rabbi. I would like to think of myself as someone who, at 61, has gained a great deal of joy and spirituality in his religious home away from home. As I become older and can impart some of this to our grandchildren, I look forward to continuing my education and being a lay leader in our congregation.

Go supplementary Jewish education!!! ■

Shavey Tisbler

I thought it might be interesting for you to hear from someone who had an extensive Yiddish education. This early experience opened my mind and heart to the value and importance of having a Jewish education as a little girl growing up in Toronto during the 1940s. As a result of that learning experience I continue, to this day, to study Yiddish. What follows is my story.

Standing at the door of the classroom, I remember the look on my father's face when Mrs. Smith said "I am sorry, Mr. Green, but your daughter is not able to join this class because there is no chair for her." We turned, and went home. After a short while, my father had banged together several pieces of wood and produced a chair. I remember as if it were yesterday, marching back to school, chair in hand, and my father saying to Mrs. Smith "Now she can start!" I was five years old and this is how I began my Yiddish education.

The Borochov School consisted of three rooms on the second floor, above the Bellevue Theatre, on College Street. By the time I had graduated at 14 years old, the school had moved to a beautiful new building on Lippincott Street, in downtown Toronto. I graduated in front of my proud family at a wonderful graduation celebration. My graduation speech to the audience was about the founding of chassidism.

Our home was Yiddish speaking. At school we studied Yiddish as a language and all the great Yiddish authors. Our teachers were the kind and gentle Mr. and Mrs Menachovsky. I went to Huron

Graduation day at the Borochov School with me and my proud parents, Lipa and Fanny Green Street Public School, and Shule five days a week. From Monday to Thursday I walked from Dupont and Huron streets, to College and Brunswick streets, stopping at home for a quick snack, so I would not be late for the 4:30 class.

On Sunday mornings, again we had two hours of classes. I don't ever remember complaining or even thinking about not attending class. Shule was my haven and my solitude, where my thirst for learning was always being nurtured. Every Sunday, after class, my friends and I would go across the street to the local deli where we would buy our 10 cent hotdog and Coke. Shule was also a meeting place for me and my friends.

The Borochov School became Zionistic after 1948, so (after our hotdogs and Coke) we donned our blue shirts, held our blue JNF boxes, and went door to door collecting money to help plant trees in Israel.

Many years ago, Jewish education options were very limited. Today there are so many opportunities for young people to further their Jewish education. ■

THE ACADEMY FOR GIFTED CHILDREN – P.A.C.E.

PRIVATE SCHOOL

The Academy for Gifted Children, P.A.C.E., is the only school in Ontario devoted entirely to intellectually gifted students. The primary goal of P.A.C.E. is to find and enhance the abilities of each child, in order to maximize his or her potential for success, while addressing the social and emotional needs of each student. Barbara Rosenberg, Director of P.A.C.E., is a specialist in gifted education. P.A.C.E. is based on the premise that gifted children need high-powered learning experiences to challenge their minds and ensure intellectual growth and achievement. P.A.C.E. offers a differentiated education, a curriculum that is built on greater depth and breadth of instruction and a more complex approach to learning.

A fully balanced school program, including the fine arts and physical education, complements this specialized academic program.

HONOURABLE MENTIONS

Lisa Cantkier

Our son Elan is 8 years old and in Grade 3. He started attending Jewish Youth Network (JYN) Sunday School Program in Thornhill when he was six and in the first grade. The program is led by Rabbi Shmuli and Chani Nachlas.

We honestly can't speak highly enough of the program. The caring, kind and warm atmosphere of the school and staff goes far beyond our expectations. Elan always looks forward to attending the program, and walks in and out with a huge smile from ear to ear. There is a fully unconditionally caring, non-judgemental and accepting philosophy that JYN and the Chabad organization offer to families and children alike, and it is reflective of the true spirit of being a Jew.

Beyond all of that, JYN offers a progressive and successful Aleph Champ Hebrew reading program based on passing various levels. Elan enjoys this very much and we have seen huge progress with his reading and understanding of written Hebrew. He learns about Torah, holidays and what it means to be a Jew. We believe JYN offers a program that is exemplary for what a Sunday school program should strive to be and we feel blessed to have found the program in our area. ■

Ryan Forman

Tanya and I would like to thank Rabbi and Rebbetzin Nachlas for all the warmth and support that they have shown our family in so many different ways. Our youngest son Ricky attends the JYN Hebrew school. There is nothing more special than when I or my husband arrive to pick him up from Hebrew school and to see him bounding down the stairs with a huge smile on his face, yarmulke on his head, random, messy project in his hand, chatting away to one of the friends that he has met at the school.

It is a testament to Rebbetzin Nachlas and her teachers who have taught Ricky to learn to read Hebrew so diligently. Ricky often comes home to tell us about the holidays that he learned about that week and is a willing participant when it comes to making the prayers over the challah or wine for Friday night kiddush or lighting the candles for the menorah on Chanukah.

All we can say is thank you to JYN Hebrew School for instilling Jewish values in our son and for helping to make him a true mensch. ■

Amy Papernick

Every Chanukah my kids get so excited and can't wait for the Jewish Youth Network's menorah-making contest. We talk about it for weeks beforehand and plan every detail to make the perfect menorah.

This excitement is what I love about the Jewish Youth Network's approach to supplementary Jewish education. Torah studies, prayers and holidays are brought to life every week through creative, passionate and enthusiastic teaching. Ongoing projects and reward systems keep my three children who attend the school each week engaged and excited about learning.

The Jewish Youth Network has been a great choice for a supplementary Jewish education for my family. It aligns perfectly with our Jewish and traditional beliefs. What's great about the school is that it feels like a real community. All of my children have friends from their local public school in their Sunday school class. It is so nice that on Sundays they all gather together to learn about Judaism. Whether it's a story, or a craft or a game, or a token for good work, the kids always have stories to share with us and with their friends back at school the next week.

The Jewish Youth Network strives to include every Jewish child in our community. We celebrate our Judaism and are encouraged and taught to do more.

At the Jewish Youth Network the students work every week on the Aleph Champ program where they learn to read Hebrew in preparation for their bar and bat mitzvahs. As I listen to them practice at home, I kvell and know that I have chosen the right supplementary Jewish school for my kids. ■

Elise Loterman

My journey with Jewish day school education began as a two year old at the Jewish Community Centre, continued at Associated Hebrew Schools, and culminated with four years at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

It's true that my Jewish education did not conclude the day I graduated from CHAT, however it was definitely those formative years that turned me onto Jewish studies, taught me to speak Hebrew (almost) fluently, and gave me the opportunity to learn time management and organizational skills that have been crucial in my personal and professional development.

Growing up in a traditional Jewish family, we celebrated Shabbat, were conscientious of kashrut, and had large family holiday celebrations.

What Jewish day school provided me was the opportunity to dig deeper, and the opportunity to ask why. [I learned] not to accept our performance of Jewish customs and rituals "just because," but to learn the historical significance and the Jewish legal reasoning behind the action.

Upon completing high school, I proceeded to do an undergraduate degree double majoring in psychology and religion, and master's degree focusing on Jewish studies.

When beginning the job search, working in the Jewish community seemed like the most natural step. I had constantly been in awe of my Jewish studies teachers and rabbis and the amount of knowledge they were able to impart in me as my mind developed and grew. I wanted to have the opportunity to be that teacher, mentor, and role model.

This led me to embark on a career with Hillel. There is rarely a week that goes by that a student or colleague does not ask me a question about an upcoming Jewish holiday, Shabbat practice or fast day. My Jewish day school education provided the foundation to begin a meaningful and relevant career where I can confidently answer these questions. It provided me with the knowledge and interest to continue my Jewish learning and growth as an adult and helped me land me a career where I am excited to go to work everyday and share this wisdom with those around me. ■

Homeschooling – an alternative education

SHAYLA GUNTER-GOLDSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When Aileen Morris was in Grade 1, both she and her parents knew organized, traditional education wasn't a good fit. Aileen, now 21, was a square peg in a round hole.

Aileen has Asperger's, a mild form of autism. She is a bright, inquisitive and creative young woman. As a child, she displayed many of these same qualities, but the schools she was attending seemed to be killing her enthusiasm for learning. Her mother, Marni, began supplementing Aileen's education at home and by Grade 6 she was homeschooling Aileen exclusively. Or, rather, she began "un-schooling."

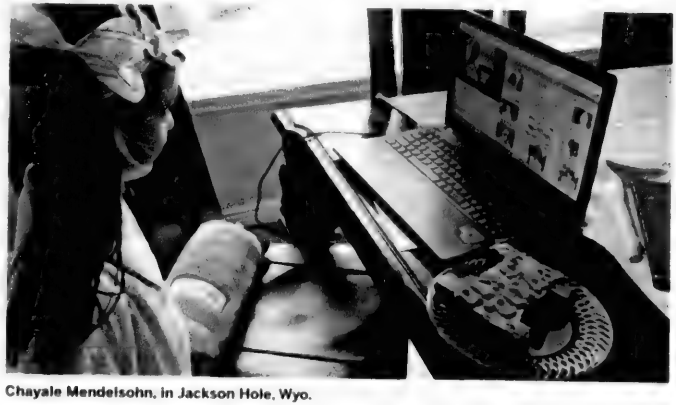
"Schools are set on the same template," explains Marni. "They focus on a rigid, behavioural approach to learning. They focus on getting the curriculum done and testing students. We believe the focus should be on developmental learning... how kids behave, how they best learn based on what their interests are and what they express their needs to be."

In homeschooling, or un-schooling, parents teach their children from either a set provincial curriculum, or based on child-directed needs. Some parents use the numerous lesson plans found online, or provided by provincial boards.

Many have less structure, but still have formal lessons. Others focus on life schooling. In the beginning, Marni provided a fairly structured path for Aileen and her younger sister Layla – both in English and Jewish studies. However, these lessons were using an academic approach, with little or no life learning.

"Isn't it better to learn about nutrition by going to the store, reading labels and cooking balanced meals together? If you're not really practicing it, it doesn't make sense to me," she says.

Rabbi Yossi Berktin of Chabad Markham agrees wholeheartedly. Three years ago he, along with a local family, created a "boutique" school. Four families were involved, with children between grades 2 and 4. They focused on the individuals rather than a grade. Two rabbis teach Jewish curriculum to the boys for part of the day – Hebrew studies, Chumash, etc., and in the afternoon, two mothers teach the English studies.



Chayale Mendelsohn, in Jackson Hole, Wyo.

The idea appeals to families who are seeking alternatives that allow them to stay within the day school model and curriculum, but also meet the individual emotional and behavioural needs of each child.

In Rabbi Berktin's model, the focus is on skill building, learning outside of books and a curriculum called "Limudei Emunah" – Faithful Learning. It is based on the idea that there are no mundane, secular studies, only holy studies, because God is ever present. Teachers attempt to make everything practical for students, encouraging discovery, experimentation and creativity. It's for families who want to stay true to how the Torah is taught, but also to include English studies – while personalizing studies based on individual needs.

Children who thrive in homeschooling are often bright, self-motivated and self-directed in nature. "They take the material we offer and go beyond where you could even possibly think about it," says Rabbi Berktin.

Chabad also has an international online school for shluchim, their representative families around the world. It's cutting-edge technology, using Skype to have children interact in a classroom. There are breakout rooms for the various grades, and Smart boards are used regularly.

Rebbetzin Raizy Mendelsohn lives in Jackson Hole, Wyo. This former Torontonian married a Lubavitch rabbi from Ottawa. Raizy says the program is "life-saving and phenomenal." The school is divided into time zones for Asia, Europe, and Western and Eastern Americas. "It's wonderful for those isolated from other Jewish schools, in remote areas... but also excellent for those having trouble in regular Jewish schools."

For homeschoolers, both in the Jewish and secular worlds, it's obvious that traditional schools are missing the mark when it comes to their children's learning.

"Life isn't really full of subjects," says Marni Morris. "But it is filled with experiences. And, that's what I'm trying to give my children." Raizy Mendelsohn agrees. "Do you have to be sitting at a desk to learn? Absolutely not."■

Centre helps kids and parents deal with school anxiety

DANIELLE KUBES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Anne Marie Albano headlined Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre's conference, "Anxiety, Addiction, Avoidance," to celebrate its 40th anniversary helping youth transition successfully into adulthood.

Albano, along with four other panelists, discussed dealing with children who are so anxious that they avoid going to school, in this all-day conference at TIFF Lightbox last fall.

"You've got to help them figure out places that they can ease their way in and start to be successful," says Albano, who is the director of the Columbia University Clinic for Anxiety and Related Disorders.

Parents are an essential part of the helping to treat this sort of anxiety, says Albano, who advocates an old-school style of parenting, which is a mixture of tough love and using small rewards to shape behaviour.

If a young child is refusing to attend school for example, it's all right to offer him something he wants to motivate him to attend.

One child who Albano worked with, for example, loved Froot Loops. So she offered her a tiny cup of Froot Loops after a wholesome breakfast if she would attend school – not a whole bowl at once, Albano insists, but just enough. Then she would get more and more Froot Loops as her attendance increased. The incentive worked.

Albano cautions, however, not to offer kids lavish rewards, as they are often happy with the small things in life.

"They'll work for peanuts, kids," she says.

For an older child, who may be more demanding and have more desires, it's especially important for parents to restrain themselves.

Albano tells of one family from the United States whose preteen promised he would attend school if only the parents bought him an Xbox. The parents complied, and the child naturally stayed up all night playing video games and was too tired, never mind anxious, to attend school.

Albano advised the parents to negotiate small rewards rather than giving a large dose of the incentive at once. If the child went to school, for example, he would then be allowed to play 10 minutes of Xbox. Then, the rewards can grow in corresponding increases to compliant behaviour.

She calls this the "grandmother rule", and it can be applied to any number of situations, not only those surrounding anxiety, to get your children to listen.

The simplest example takes place at dinnertime when parents tell children that they can have a cupcake, but only if they eat dinner first – and then only one cupcake.

In general, the best way to deal with anxious children is to take it slow, praising small achievements, and calling in professional help when needed.

But anxiety is a mental health issue that affects people of all ages. The causes are not known, but the illness can manifest in ways that makes it difficult to function properly at work, home and during daily activities.

The Diamond Centre is a branch of Jewish Family and Child, which has served the Greater Toronto Area since the 19th century. The Children's Mental Health Centre opened in 1974 and was renamed after the executive director in the 1980s. It provides day programs and counselling to teenagers and their families who are struggling with psychological and academic challenges. ■

Parents need to monitor children's computer use

To regulate children's consumption of technology, we must first start with ourselves, suggests Bruce Ballon, a panelist at Jerome D. Diamond Adolescent Centre's fall conference, "Anxiety, Addiction, Avoidance."

Who hasn't seen four year olds on the TTC, faces buried in the flashing lights of a scrolling iPad, parents behind them, pleased their children are finally behaving on a crowded streetcar?

That's basically like saying, "Here, have cocaine for your four year old," says Ballon, head of the adolescent clinical educational services for problem gambling, gaming and Internet addiction at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health.

A study from PLOS One in 2012 showed that Chinese adolescents who were addicted to the Internet suffered from structural changes to the brain, including abnormal white matter fibres, that is also frequently seen in people with substance abuse problems.

But you don't necessarily need to be clinically addicted to the Internet to suffer from overuse. These days, when many children and teenagers are waking up to the alarm clocks from their phone, typing notes at school on their laptops, spending the commute home reading on their iPads, and then going home to watch TV and play video games, it can be hard to distinguish what amount of screen time is normal or healthy.

"There's no public healthcare guidelines," he says.

So parents are left to determine themselves what is an appropriate amount of time spent with technology.

"It's more about being able to manage the relationship with their technology. Knowing when to put it down – that's the major issue. Because it's everywhere. Maybe it's not too much, but it's misused. It's affecting them in ways they don't even realize," he says.

Some of the more mild consequences seen in technological overuse are poor dietary habits, poor hygiene and insomnia.

But some of the more insidious consequences can have a wider-reaching effect on our society, depending on the sort of technology one is partaking in. ■

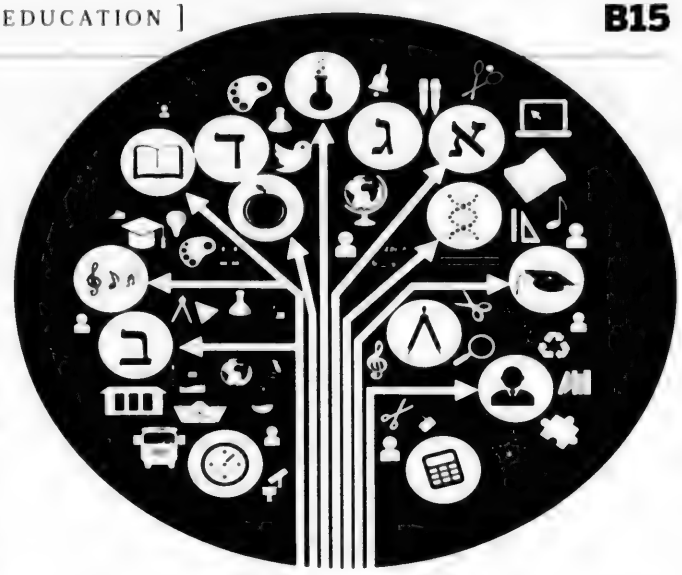
Is Jewish education a right or a privilege?



VICKY TOBIANAH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Is Jewish education a right or a privilege? Is the quality better than public schools? Is the value worth it?

Those are some questions Jewish day school parents grapple with as they determine where to send their children – to a private Jewish day school where costs are on average $15,000-$25,000 per year – or to a public school along with supplementary Jewish education (or none at all).

For parents like Zev Steinfeld, a teacher at Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who has publicly shared his disappointment and frustrations with the subsidy application process in The CJN, the process must change.

"I think the issue of tuition is part of a systemic issue that relates to the sustainability of Jewish education, and the sustainability of the infrastructure of the Jewish community as a whole," said Steinfeld, 34, who has two kids in the day school system.

"Is [Jewish education] a right or a privilege? If it's a privilege, then if you can afford it, great. But if philosophically speaking, Jewish education is a right, then it's imperative for communal organizations to do whatever they can to make it fair and accessible and that's where the problem lies."

Elie Kochman, whose daughter is in Grade 1 at Eitz Chaim, was disappointed and frustrated with the lack of communication he received as a first-time parent to the Jewish day school system.

"There are a lot of gaps in terms of what's communicated to the parents. Even when I tried to get that information – I need to know if I apply for a subsidy, realistically speaking how much I can expect to get – they're evasive and say it's a very complicated calculation," said Kochman, 32. "I don't trust the process because of how secretive it is. It seems arbitrary even if it's not."

Because of the rising cost of tuition, families must decide if the value is worth the price.

"It's a deterrent simply because it's so high. Even people who may value Judaism don't value it enough to spend $25,000 plus depending on how many kids you have," said Steinfeld. "Jewish school was always expensive but there was always the perception that it's better than what I get in a public school. That perception has changed. Public schools have better reputations especially in York Region."

For Elaine Grant, however, who has one son recently starting the Jewish day school system, tuition is a big expense but the value is worth it.

"When you compare what they charge for Jewish day school versus an actual private school, price-wise, it's pretty great," said Grant, 34. "When you look at the grand scheme, it's for the future of your child – how can you really put a price on that if you see the benefits for your child down the road."

The perceived value of Jewish day schools is something The Akiva School, a pluralistic day school in Montreal, recently analyzed through a parent survey last spring.

"Parents want a Jewish day school without compromising academics. They want to be prepared for the future and the world," said Jennifer Fraenkel, head of school. "Our raison d'etre is that we're a Jewish school – it's not just about the curriculum but about chesed, moral development, Jewish life and building a Jewish identity. When parents see how important Jewish identity is and know they're not sacrificing academics, this is the choice for them because they're getting it all."

Fraenkel said tuition is always a topic of discussion but not a barrier to entry. Unlike many other day schools, they use a third-party company to evaluate subsidy applications and post clear guidelines on what parents can expect to pay per child, based on their income bracket, on their website.

That type of transparency is what Kochman is looking for from Toronto Jewish day schools. "There's no feedback. That bothers me more than the actual dollar I'm paying – how did they come up with that number? For the amount of money they're collecting, I don't think it's unreasonable to request to spend five minutes to tell me exactly why I'm paying the amount I am."

Steinfeld said after publicly sharing his frustrations with the system in a CJN article a few months ago, the amount of feedback he's gotten has been astonishing. "Strangers have come to me and said how they literally buried themselves in debt because they didn't want to go through the subsidy process, and found the experience onerous and traumatizing on some level."

He said he'd like to see community organizations make this issue a real priority.

Daniel Held, executive director of the Julia & Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education, said, "we're in the process of updating the process so we can be more transparent, and communicate what the criteria for a subsidy is.

"But it's a big process because there are 14 schools and 2,300 students. We started the process in the fall and we're working to implement it over the next couple of years. My hope is that the pilot with the first round of schools will start for this coming academic year and then roll it out to all of them."

In this process, said Held, "we're looking to do three things: move the system online so it's easier and less cumbersome, and have it administered by a third-party company. We're looking to being able to articulate who is eligible for a subsidy and what the criteria are."■

Arrowsmith teaches students new way to learn

Training your brain can change your life: neuroplasticity, while not a new science is beginning to transform the way we look at learning disabilities and education.

Today, one in every 10 Canadians has a learning disability. Depending on the type of learning disability and its severity, academic performance for students can be a challenge.

Imagine straining to understand. Imagine missing important instructions, subtle comments and the tone of voice when the teacher is delivering instructions. Imagine being aware that everyone else understood while you were miles behind. This is what life is like for those affected by learning disabilities.

Joanne's daughter, Elizabeth, was one such student. "We worried about it all the time, we dreaded school reports, we dreaded when the school called. She was doing homework all night, every night with absolutely no gain, and no benefit."

Then Joanne enrolled Elizabeth at the Arrowsmith School in Toronto. The school operates a cognitive program founded on the science of neuroplasticity, which addresses the underlying causes of learning disabilities. The Arrowsmith Program employs a suite of cognitive exercises designed to strengthen the underperforming regions of the brain. These areas of the brain are treated like weak muscles and are intensely stimulated in order to produce strengthened learning capacities, essentially rewiring the brain for better performance.

Reading and understanding relationships and concepts was almost impossible for Elizabeth before starting the Arrowsmith Program, but soon that began to change. "She started the program never actually having completed a book. After two months she picked up her first book. It was about 700 pages long and she read it in a couple of weeks. It was unbelievable," said Joanne.

Joanne is just one of thousands of parents worldwide seeing the benefits of a neuroplastic intervention in their children's education.

"It allows these children to realize their dreams. What these students talk to me about is that at a certain point they stopped daring to dream," says Barbara Arrowsmith Young, founder and director of the Arrowsmith Program and School.

Arrowsmith Young suffered extensively with learning disabilities before developing the Arrowsmith Program, a journey chronicled in her bestselling book The Woman Who Changed Her Brain.

"Having a learning disability is not a life sentence. You can change very particular parts of the brain to allow them to function and it's just amazing what happens when you do that. Learning that was a challenge now becomes effortless and pleasurable."

By engaging in the Arrowsmith Program students like Elizabeth are provided with a new capacity to acquire, absorb and retain information, not only allowing them to learn, but also giving them the opportunity to change their outlook on their future.

"I couldn't read, I'd never read a full book at the age of 13. I hated reading," says Elizabeth. "I never thought these doors could be open for me, and now they are wide open and I can do anything." ■

Trudeau and Harper unite for Purim, and a miracle snack is born...?

Tories, Libs combine as 'Hoser Union'

Inspired by Israeli politics, Canada's two most popular parties plan to run together in the next federal election. The Conservatives and Liberals say they'll combine to form a new party, called "Hoser Union." If the party wins in 2015, its two leaders, Stephen Harper and Justin Trudeau, have agreed to share the prime ministership. Under terms of the deal, Harper will serve two years, then Trudeau will take over for two. "If anyone knows how to maintain a stable democracy, it's the Israelis," a senior Hoser Union official said of the surprise move. "What could possibly go wrong?" NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair was invited to join, but declined, saying his party prefers being in opposition.

House passes anti-Semitism motion

The House of Commons last week unanimously passed a motion condemning the rise of global anti-Semitism. The Feb. 24 motion grew out of a four-hour debate on the issue. It cited "an alarming increase in anti-Semitism worldwide," including "the firebombing of synagogues and community centres, the vandalizing of Jewish memorials and cemeteries, incendiary calls for the destruction of Israel and the Jewish People, and anti-Jewish terror." It reaffirmed "the importance of the Ottawa Protocol on Combating anti-Semitism" and urged the government to "continue advancing the combating of anti-Semitism as a domestic and international priority." Defence Minister Jason Kenney and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler initiated the debate.

Maybe this stuff is good for babies.

It's almost like medicine

A three-year study out of King's College London last week said babies and young kids who ate the hugely popular peanut-flavoured Israeli snack Bamba were 81 per cent less likely to develop a peanut allergy than those who didn't consume the crunchy treat, suggesting early exposure to peanuts leads to desensitization. Researchers tested 640 British children from 2006 to 2009. They were trying to explain why Israeli kids had one-tenth the rate of peanut allergies compared to Jewish kids in Britain. So should kids be immunized with Bamba? Discuss. ■

March of the Living

We appreciate the CJN sharing with us the perspective of Holocaust survivor Eli Pfefferkorn after meeting with the students who interviewed him in advance of the March of the Living ("New methods needed to keep memory of Shoah alive," Feb. 26).

Pfefferkorn takes to task the March of the Living for the sample questions the students came prepared with. We would like to point out that these young people are just at the start of their March of the Living experience, which entails about four months of pre-trip education. Tackling a subject as enormous and as complex as the Holocaust would be a daunting task for anyone of any age, especially for those so young.

What Pfefferkorn was trying to convey to the students, the utter cruelty and arbitrary nature of life in the camps, is not a concept all students will grasp right away in a one-time interview, even with someone as eloquent and as insightful as Pfefferkorn.

But after their experience on the March, after spending considerable time in the presence of Holocaust survivors, in Canada, Poland and Israel, we hope the students will have gained the kind of in-depth understanding that Pfefferkorn tried to convey to the students in his initial meeting.

Undoubtedly, some will. Others, even after this experience may still struggle to understand the complete reality of the Holocaust in its totality. But all of them will remember the stories of the Holocaust survivors and, pledge, each in their own way, to keep alive the memory of their experiences, along with the memory of their lost loved ones.

PLO unveiled in court

The jury in federal court in Manhattan has finally ripped the veil covering the face of evil that is the Palestinian Liberation Organization and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

No more can the PA claim anything was spontaneous – not the first and second intifadahs, not the attacks by rock-throwing youths who wounded and killed Israeli motorists, not the murderers who plowed vehicles into crowds at tram stops, not the thugs who stabbed unsuspecting civilians in synagogues and in the streets, and certainly not the terrorists who crept into homes at night to slaughter men, women and children.

The PA, the so-called charities that fund them and the countries and banks that facilitate their activities are all guilty of terrorism and deserve the scorn and sanction of the civilized world.

Never again can any Islamists hide behind the facade that terror attacks were unplanned and in response to a cartoon, video or some other perceived offence. Terror attacks in New York, Madrid, London, Benghazi, Paris and Ottawa did not just happen. They were planned. No individual or group would dare take action without the express urging and approval of their tribal rulers. This trial has bared the truth.

Iran's nuclear ambitions

In a letter "Iran is not the threat," (Feb. 12) the letter writer indicates that a previous letter had wrongly assumed that Iran is trying to produce nuclear weapons. Why would Iran, which is a major oil exporter, require 10,000 centrifuges at great cost unless it wished to have nuclear weapons capability?

Iranian officials have not stated that they wish to have a nuclear weapons stockpile, for obvious reasons, but all of the evidence before us is clear – there is no reason for the centrifuges except to make nuclear weapons. And the value to Iran, which has clear ambitions to be the power in that part of the world, is clear – the leverage associated with having nuclear weapons would provide material support for that objective.

Certainly, the messaging coming out of Iran's Sunni opponents in the Middle East is clear, and once Iran acquires the bomb, we will see Saudi Arabia and perhaps Egypt moving in the same direction. They know what Iran is up to, even if the president of the United States does not.

This is clear: Iran is the world's greatest state sponsor of terror. And given Iran's long-range missiles and its proven ability to wreak havoc around the globe, that would not be something that would make this world a better or a safer place.

Rambam Health Care Campus
Prepared for all Imminent Scenarios

According to the latest news, Iran and Hezbollah are planning an imminent joint invasion of Israel's northern Galilee region. This reality has forced Rambam Hospital, to make equipping the Sammy Ofer Fortified Underground Emergency Hospital an urgent priority.

The largest structure of its kind in the world, sets a new standard for safe care in times of extreme emergency. This visionary structure converts from a 1,500-vehicle parking lot into a 2,000-bed emergency hospital fortified against conventional and non-conventional weapons.

As Rambam serves over two million residents in the north of Israel, we must be prepared to safely provide the highest level of medical care, especially in these times the need is more urgent than ever.

We cannot do it without your help.

Your gift will help fund one of the most advanced initiatives of its kind in the world and serve as a lasting reminder of your solidarity with Israel at the time of their greatest need.

We are an Orthodox family, so when our father died, it was important to have a service that strictly observed Jewish law. We chose Benjamin's because of their superior care. RABBI·2·RABBI

Defining the Israel-Diaspora relationship

Can the state and its leaders ever legitimately claim to speak for world Jewry, or is a two-way dialogue a better model to aspire to?

RABBI ARI ISENBERG
SHAAR SHALOM CONGREGATION, HALIFAX

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Isenberg: In response to the recent wave of anti-Semitic attacks in Europe, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has repeatedly called on the Jews of Europe to make aliyah. The prime minister's rhetoric has triggered a range of responses – from criticism, to ambiguity, to unwavering support.

It strikes me as important to consider what some of the great Jewish leaders of the mid-20th century might have thought of Netanyahu's proposal.

Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, believed Jewish communities in the Diaspora were ultimately finite, and Diaspora Jewry would ultimately need Israel as a refuge from an otherwise hostile world. Conversely, Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan believed the existence of Israel would infuse Diaspora Jews with self-assuredness and ensure the survival of Diaspora communities.

Both Ben-Gurion and Rabbi Kaplan believed in the integral role of the State of Israel, but for drastically different reasons. It seems Rabbi Kaplan would have been at odds with the current prime minister's declaration, whereas Ben-Gurion would have supported it.

What are some other voices to consider?

Rabbi Cutler: I think it's important to remember the Ben-Gurion Blaustein Agreement of 1950. In the early days of the State of Israel, American Jews were rightly concerned about being accused of dual loyalty if the Israeli political leadership spoke too openly about aliyah and too vociferously as the voice of world Jewry. Israel, meanwhile, had an ongoing need for new olim and the support of the American Jewish community.

Ben-Gurion and Jacob Blaustein, then-president of the American Jewish Committee, agreed not to step on each other's toes. Ben-Gurion affirmed that "the State of Israel spoke only for its own citizens," and "Jews in other countries had no political obligation to the State of Israel."

It strikes me that Netanyahu has increasingly assumed the persona of protector of world Jewry and promoted the idea of Israel not as a home for the Jews, but the home for the Jews. That idea goes against western liberal ideas enshrined in early American political writings and the welcoming of Jews as French nationals in the early part of the 19th century.

Rabbi Isenberg: When interacting with Jewish university students and young professionals living in the Diaspora, I sometimes ask them to list five Jewish programs or events in which they've participated in the past year. Invariably, their lists include Birthright trips to Israel, celebrating Israel's Independence Day, and embarking on academic semesters in Israel, donating to Israeli causes. For them, it seems, "Israel" and "Jewish" – once distinct – are now inextricably linked. Singing Hatikvah is just as important as chanting Kol Nidre.

I welcome the infusion of the modern State of Israel into daily Jewish activity and identity. Surely, Judaism is stronger today as a result. It can even be argued that Israel's elected officials should serve, in part, as representatives for world Jewry.

But here is the key: for Israel's voice to truly represent the entirety of world Jewry, it would need to reflect Judaism's inherent pluralism and breadth of perspectives. In Canada, for instance, a Jew can seek out a brand of Judaism that reflects her or his worldview and understanding of our religion. Ultimately, Israel will need to ensure all Jewish perspectives are included in its voice if it wishes to serve as an effective spokesperson for us all.

Rabbi Cutler: Certainly, the State of Israel can do more to respect and represent the values of North American Jewry – welcoming, if not promoting, Jewish religious pluralism tops the list.

Still, I don't believe the Israeli political leadership will ever be able to speak fully and completely for world Jewry. And that's a good thing. Israel is but one part – albeit a crucial, central part – of Jewish civilization in 2015. Its concerns and desires will never totally align with those of Diaspora communities.

As we continue to build ever-stronger ties between Diaspora communities and our brothers and sisters in Israel, the purpose is not to have both communities grow more alike. Rather, it is to learn from each other – to find our commonalities, but also to note our differences, which are sometimes significant.

I hope those differences continue to flourish. They are ultimately to our benefit. ■

The launch of CJN TV

It's been nearly one year since we unveiled a dramatic redesign of The Canadian Jewish News. During the last 12 months, we've tackled the serious issues facing Jewish communities across Canada, and ruffled a few feathers along the way. At the same time, we've continued to celebrate the tremendous achievements and incredible potential of Canadian Jewry. It's been a wild year.

But the journey has only just begun, and we're not content to rest on our laurels. To be successful, we know we have to keep thinking big – because these days, it's not enough to just put out a great newspaper every week. It's essential that we keep working to grow the CJN brand.

And with that in mind, I'm here to tell you about our latest venture: CJN TV.

It's a bold step forward for Jewish programming in this country – a 24/7 cable channel beaming the best of The CJN into your homes.

Here are a few of the exciting shows you can expect to see on CJN TV.

Rabbi vs. Rabbi: Some of our readers have complained that the religious leaders featured in our popular Rabbi2Rabbi column sometimes come off as being a little too friendly with one another. We hear you and promise that definitely won't be the case when rabbis face off on our new prime-time flagship. The gloves are about to come off, and no less than denominational superiority is at stake.

Dry Bones: The popular Jewish cartoon comes to life in this live-action series. Tune in Wednesdays at 9 p.m. as our lovable protagonist presents his unique takes on Israel and Judaism, mostly while talking only to himself. Ezra Levant stars.

The Alter Bocher: Ten single Jewish women vie for the heart of one eligible Jewish bachelor. And let me tell you, this guy is a real catch – a doctor, a lawyer and a rabbi. Think of it as our way of combating intermarriage. Stay tuned – auditions begin soon on The CJN's official JSwipe account.

Wake up with The CJN: Beginning at Neitz Hachama, CJN TV delivers comprehensive live minyan coverage from across the country. And when you subscribe to our deluxe package, you get access to just about every style of davening imaginable. Plus, our HD feed is so realistic, it'll feel like you're actually in shul.

Shabbat programming: We thought long and hard about how to fill our Saturday airtime. On the one hand, we didn't want to offend anyone who won't turn on a TV on Shabbat. But on the other hand, we can't deny there are Jews who will tune in on the day of rest. With that in mind, here's the compromise we devised: On Shabbat, we're handing the reins over to Jewish federations, who will be in charge of programming in their own local markets. Find out who's donating to federation, and exactly how much, with real-time updates – it's all there on the handy scrolling ticker at the bottom of the screen. Viewer discretion is advised.

In praise of the landsmanschaft

Bill Gladstone

In a series of articles written for this newspaper about four decades ago, the late CJN columnist J.B. Salsberg reminisced with great affection about the "Apter Shtibl" in downtown Toronto, which he had frequented in his youth during World War I.

The Apter Society – one of dozens of Jewish landsmanschaft organizations, mutual benefit associations and fraternal orders that would spring up in Toronto – had established itself in a modest old frame cottage on Centre Avenue decorated with some hand-me-down tables and chairs, a pot-bellied stove and a wooden cupboard that served as the Ark for the Torah.

"Most of the newcomers came from Poland, and a lot of them found that the war shattered their plans to bring their families to the new land," Salsberg wrote. "Others, who were planning to return to the 'Old Country,' were, of course, unable to do so. As a result, there were a lot of lonely men in our midst. The shtibl of one's own townsfolk and the fraternal or war-relief society of landsleit helped to fill many voids. It provided a warm, hospitable haven for the lonely and the unacclimatized immigrants in the strange, new land."

Besides fellowship, the landsmanschaft and mutual benefit societies typically helped newly arrived immigrants with immediate needs such as food, shelter and employment. They also met longer-term needs by providing interest-free loans, medical coverage, synagogue affiliation, assistance for widows and orphans, and cemetery privileges.

Today, one of the best places to learn about these organizations is the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA), Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre, where a multitude of minute books, records and jubilee souvenir booklets recall their storied pasts. Commonly in these books, the ancestral shtetlach are recalled with an overlay of nostalgic sweetness despite the hunger, poverty, persecutions and other bitter happenings often associated with these places.

Many societies extended helping hands not only locally but also to relatives and brethren left behind in the shtetl who may have been in dire need of rescue. Nachman Shemen, who wrote a history of the Chenstochover Aid Society for its 50th anniversary booklet in 1964, noted that it was founded by people who wanted to do "both relief work for overseas and mutual assistance here on a fraternal basis."

Established with similar aims, the Beizetchiner, Chmielnicker, Driltzer, Ivansker, Kieltzer, Lagover, Linitzer, Lodzer, Mozirer, Ostrovtzer, Ovruch-Voliner, Ozerover, Radomer, Stopnitzer, Warszawer and Zaglember societies were among those that typically focused on helping their landsleit (fellow townsfolk) from a specific town or district.

Geographically speaking, some organizations took a much wider mandate. The First Roumanian Hebrew Congregation Adath Israel, for example, assisted all immigrants from Romania, while the highly popular Pride of Israel Sick Benefit Society served everyone in the community, no matter where they originated from.

An abundance of souvenir booklets and other materials representing Kielce, Radom, Lagov, Ostrowiec, Opatow (Apt), Driltz (Ilza), Staszow and other central Polish shtetlach attest to a remarkable phenomenon: from the early 1900s onward, Jews from the Kielce-Radom region and vicinity poured into Toronto in astonishing numbers.

Demographers and historians have yet to adequately explain what special magnet drew so many of them here, except to observe that "one usually followed the other." By comparison, it's been observed that a much higher preponderance of Russian and Romanian Jews immigrated to Montreal.

Not even the late great Canadian Jewish Congress demographer Louis Rosenberg could explain this phenomenon in his informative study, Jewish Mutual Benefit & Friendly Societies in Toronto: The First Fifty Years (1896-1945), also available at the OJA.

Over the last half-century, most of Toronto's landsmanschaft and mutual benefit societies have been gradually winding down or have already folded. Having outlived their original purpose, most of them can see the writing on the wall.

In recent years, a dozen local societies have established endowments with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, collectively worth nearly $1 million. Thus they are perpetuating their charitable deeds for generations to come. Their memories, too, will live on: many of their histories are

European Jews move en masse to Canada

Local communities prepare to welcome the newcomers with Canuck hospitality BY DAVID LEVINE

In the wake of terrorist attacks in Paris and Copenhagen, and facing both economic instability and resurgent anti-Semitism across the continent, Europe's Jews have made it official: they're moving to Canada.

The choice has come as a surprise to pundits and xenophobes worldwide, and disappointed Jewish communities in Israel and the United States, which had been widely considered the two leading candidate nations.

The decision comes on the heels of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's appeal to European Jewry to emigrate to Israel, and Danish Prime Minister Helle Thorning-Schmidt's assertion that her country's Jews "belong in Denmark."

"All this attention has been flattering, really," said Europe's 1.5 million Jews. "Bibi wants us in Israel, Denmark wants us to stay – France, not so much. In the end, we had to make the right decision for us. It's not at all personal. We just hope everyone understands that."

Europe's Jewish community is more than 2,100 years old, predating the reign of Casesar Augustus, when early Jewish immigrants were first welcomed with open arms by all the peoples of Europe, as they would continue to be for centuries. Despite their meagre contributions to European culture and thought, Jewish communities across the continent have been subjected to seemingly endless bouts of equality and social justice, with few notable exceptions.

"It's been one heck of a ride. They will be sorely missed," said the remaining 99.78 per cent of Europe, suppressing a smirk. "We swear."

Observers have cited Canada's multicultural society, depressed dollar and chronic politeness as key factors in the decision, but Europe's Jews see their decision differently.

"Think of it more like retirement. We are a very old community, and we've been through a lot. Why would we want to move anywhere noisy or exciting? At our age, the less excitement the better."

"Nationally speaking, Canada is basically an old-age home: it's quiet. The people are nice. The health care is good. You always feel a little cold. It's far enough out of the way that you don't have to visit all the time, but close enough that you can get there when you need to."

A group of Danish Jews arrive at Pearson Airport. VALESTOCK / SHUTTERSTOCK.COM

As for how the decision was reached, Europe's Jews are surprisingly candid: "We were pretty surprised [by the choice of Canada] ourselves. When we took the poll at our secret meeting, [Canada] didn't get a single first place vote, but it was almost everyone's second choice, so…"

Speaking on the condition of anonymity, all of European Jewry has intimated that centuries of immersion in European culture have created an "unconscious but pervasive disdain for Americans," which reinforced Canada as their strongest choice.

"Also," they said, "if anything goes wrong, you guys have Kevin Vickers. That clinched it."

On Israel's behalf, Netanyahu expressed disappointment and a little relief: "Of course you invite your parents to move in with you when they retire, but the nation of Israel respects their decision to move to a quiet place on the other side of the world, too far away to visit, where absolutely nothing is going to happen to them."

With the first official flights set to depart in the coming weeks and some European Jews already arriving in Canada, considerable logistical efforts are underway: Europe's synagogues and community centres are being sold to finance moving costs, and Jewish historical sites are slated for demolition, in order to avoid future desecration. All patrilineal Jews have undergone voluntary conversions and/or circumcisions to prevent "another endless debate about what 'Jewish identity' means." Intermarried couples can choose to convert and move to Canada, or divorce – in which case all children will be subject to shared intercontinental custody and double Air Miles.

And while European Jewry stocks up on sweaters and reads The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, Jewish communities across Canada are preparing to see their numbers increase by 1.5 million to 1.8 million, and rising to the challenge of absorbing their cousins from overseas.

In Toronto, officials moved quickly to demolish community buildings to make space for much larger, more modern and impressive ones, set for completion in 2041. (Update: as of The CJN's deadline, the project is 5 to 9 years behind schedule.)

Montreal's Jewish community is confident that France's Jewish population will acclimate quickly to the "unmistakable air of barely suppressed hatred" they remember so well.

In Ottawa, 13 new synagogues have been built, 11 of which will remain empty, in accordance with local tradition.

Vancouver's Jewish community has ramped up production of marijuana, prayer beads and those shoes that look like feet, while the entire Jewish population of Saskatchewan has offered to share his bachelor apartment with any newcomers looking to get settled.

Winnipeg's Jewish community (motto: "Where ennui meets torpor") had volunteered to absorb the oldest of the immigrants and is producing a short video to introduce newcomers to the city. The film, titled Like Siberia, But With Cable, is set for a spring release.

Even at these early stages, the Jewish decision to leave is yielding positive results. The mass resignation of Jews from European industry has resulted in immediate spikes in rates of employment, education and child welfare. Reports are indicating a sudden and complete end to all corruption in political and financial sectors, as well as cleaner drinking water, the discovery of several new antibiotics, the apparent reversal of global warming, and the unambiguous end to all religious and ethnic conflict.

All's well that ends well. ■

Apartheid slur driven by hatred and lies

Gil Troy

Every year, with the harsh cold of February comes the harsh rhetoric of the abomination known as "Israeli Apartheid Week." I would not object if the Palestinian national movement devoted a week to celebrating Palestinian nationalism – including envisioning what a Palestinian state could look like. But making the high point of the Palestinian student calendar a week devoted to demonizing, delegitimizing and libelling the Jewish state is offensive, and it explains why the Palestinians have failed to advance their cause in any real way.

As long as Israel-hatred lies at the heart of Palestinian ideology, Israel would be foolish to compromise, concede or even negotiate. The fact that university campuses foster this hatred is tragic. The fact that university campuses foster an inaccurate modern blood libel falsely comparing Israel to South Africa and continuing the "Zionism is racism" canard is criminal.

Zionism, meaning Jewish nationalism, starts with the understanding that Jews are a people, with collective rights to a national homeland in Palestine. Until 1948, the focus of the Jewish national liberation movement was building and establishing a state. Now, the emphasis is on protecting and perfecting it. The fact that Zionism – the idealistic movement to make the state better – is tagged with the racist label shows just how absurd and self-destructive the Palestinian attack is.

The uniqueness of the Jewish experience, whereby Jews believe in a religion, Judaism, and belong to the Jewish People, is something many modern Jews and non-Jews don't understand. This duality is why you can have a Jewish democratic state that is not a theocracy. This duality is why you have secular Jews, atheistic Jews, and Jews who emphasize family, ethnicity, culture, civilization and nationhood, along with religious Jews. In traditional Judaism, the religious and national dimensions are mutually reinforcing. Today, moderns often pick and choose.

Nevertheless, this linkage makes Zionism the least racist nationalism of all forms of nationalism. Most nationalists are born into their national group, emphasizing the biological dimension, which leads to racism. Judaism, by contrast, allows anyone to convert into the religion, and thus join the nation, making Zionism the most permeable and least racist form of nationalism. The conflict between Israelis and Palestinians is national, not racial. There are dark-skinned Israelis and light-skinned Palestinians. There are Israeli Arabs who have served in Israel's army and been killed by Palestinian terrorists. Racism is not the great divide, as it was in South Africa, where people were defined as "coloured," "mixed," etc., depending on skin colour.

The mystery, then, is why was Zionism accused of racism, and why is Israel compared to South Africa? The origins lie in the 1970s, when Soviet propagandists and Palestinian terrorists wanted to demonize Israel. They believed that if the fight for Palestine could be linked to a broader fight against western racism, imperialism and colonialism, they might win.

In fact, all these ideological lies distracted the Palestinians, focusing them on empty victories at the UN and on college campuses, rather than doing the hard work of negotiating, compromising, building a peaceful, democratic civil society, and engaging in other forms of state-building. Now, the Palestinian national movement is defined by a pernicious form of violence, terrorism, and three lies: that Israel is racist, when the fight is national; that Israel is colonialist, when Israelis and Palestinians have conflicting claims to the same land; and that Israel is imperialist, when little Israel, population eight million, is on its own and surrounded by hundreds of millions of Arabs and Muslims.

When outrageous lies become believed as accepted truths, especially in places like college campuses supposedly devoted to truth, we know that we are no longer in the realm of facts and instead are dealing with bigotry. Historically, we know what to call prejudice against Jews. We call it anti-Semitism. ■

ISIS doesn't threaten Israel today, but it could in the future

Yonah Jeremy Bob

The impact on Israeli security of the civil war in Syria that's been raging since 2011, even with the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) involved, has so far been neutral to net-positive.

The carnage in Syria has been horrifying, but from a purely Israeli perspective, the intensity of the civil war has meant that since 2011, both Syrian President Bashar Assad's forces and Hezbollah, which has sent thousands of fighters into the mix on Assad's side, have had their hands full with ISIS.

Practically speaking, this has meant not only that their attention has been diverted from making trouble for Israel, but that even the theoretical ability of Syrian government forces to threaten Israel has been significantly depleted.

For the time being, this has also been true for ISIS and other Syrian rebel groups, who themselves have had their hands full fighting Assad's forces and Hezbollah.

Moreover, as ISIS has experienced success and a growing international following, its first moves to expand beyond Syria and Iraq have been into other Muslim states with vacuums or that are immediately nearby, such as Libya (where it is strongest), Turkey, Jordan and Yemen.

Rocket fire aside, Israel has not faced a serious invasion threat in nearly 40 years, but that could change in the long term because of ISIS, which is already by far the most powerful terrorist entity in history, far exceeding Al Qaeda even in its prime.

As things currently stand, the Al-Nusra front and the Free Syrian Army (FSA), both much smaller and weaker than ISIS, control certain border areas with Israel on the deep southwest Syrian side of the Golan Heights, but ISIS' mostly northern and eastern Syrian territory has no access to the Golan, nor is it even close by.

If ISIS ever regains the upper hand in Syria, it could use the Syrian Golan border to attempt a large-scale invasion of northern Israel, which others have long been incapable of, or have been deterred from attempting, based on rational strategic thinking, which ISIS may lack.

ISIS has also shown tremendous capability to inspire new followers and currently poses real dangers beyond Syria and Iraq in Turkey, Libya (and through Libya, possibly even Italy and portions of southern Europe), the Egyptian Sinai and Jordan.

If ISIS gets an extended foothold in Sinai or parts of Jordan, these currently quiet frontiers could also suddenly become borders with invasion threats.

Then there are the dangers closer to home.

Israel has already disrupted one West Bank cell that claimed to be connected to ISIS, though it's hard to say if it had a real connection or if its members were ISIS-wannabes (though these can be as dangerous.)

Several Israeli Arabs have been arrested and indicted over the last year for signing up with Syrian jihadis, including ISIS.

Israel has not indicted any of them with carrying out or being close to carrying out terror attacks. Their crimes have been related to "contact with a foreign terror group."

But the reason they are being indicted at all stems from the very real concern that the trend of radicalized Israeli Arabs joining ISIS initially to fight Assad and then turning their sights on Israel could balloon out of control.

Since the end of the second intifadah in 2004, despite some spikes (including in recent months), there has been no widespread suicide bombing or other terror threat.

ISIS will probably be pushed back by western and allied Arab airstrikes in the future, as opposed to expanding. And even in the unlikely scenario that it gained a border with Israel, the IDF is a far superior force compared to others ISIS has fought up until now, and it would likely swiftly repel any invasion threat.

Yet even as ISIS' short-term impact has made the northern border quiet, as a long-term threat, it introduces a more dangerous and unpredictable variable than Israel has faced in some time. ■

Why Jews were Red Tories

Michael Taube

The federal Conservatives have more Jewish voters and supporters than ever before. There are two Jewish MPs – Finance Minister Joe Oliver and Mark Adler – and two others (Scott Reid and Tony Clement) with Jewish ancestry. Meanwhile, Linda Frum and Irving Gerstein both serve as Tory senators.

Yet, there have always been Canadian Jews involved with right-leaning political parties.

Here are some names that should be familiar to CJN readers.

Former senator Hugh Segal, Eddie Goodman, Stanley Hartt and former MP Gerry Weiner were active in the federal PCs. Allan Grossman was an Ontario Progressive Conservative cabinet minister, and his son, Larry, became party leader. Ron Ghitter was an Alberta PC MLA and later a senator. David Rotenberg, Charles Harnick and David Young were ministers in Ontario PC governments. Sidney Spivak was a cabinet minister in several Manitoba PC governments.

There's an interesting difference between today's Jewish Tory politicians and those of yesteryear. In the latter case, most would be classified as left-leaning conservatives, or Red Tories.

What is a Red Tory?

Gad Horowitz, a professor emeritus at the University of Toronto, created the most explicit definition. In his view, Tories and Socialists weren't very different from one another. As he wrote in the left-wing magazine Canadian Dimension in 1965, "it can be argued that socialism has more in common with toryism than with liberalism, for liberalism is possessive individualism, while socialism and toryism are variants of collectivism."

Following this train of thought, Red Toryism is a combination of high Tory sensibilities (espoused by philosopher Edmund Burke and former British prime minister Benjamin Disraeli, among others) and socialist-type policies. Hence, Canada's Tories and socialists used to share a commitment to "cradle to grave" government intervention, a social safety net and nationalism.

A further layer, democratic toryism, was added by former prime minister John Diefenbaker.

"What distinguishes the democratic tory," wrote Colin Campbell and William Christian in Parties, Leaders, and Ideologies in Canada, "is a concern for the well-being of the poor, and a belief that those who enjoy the benefits and privileges of society have a responsibility to care for those who are less well-off." The authors believed democratic toryism was fundamentally different from welfare liberalism and socialism. Adherents of this philosophy "accept progressive taxation to the extent that it reflects the fact that the rich ought to bear a greater burden of responsibility commensurate with their greater wealth, but does not see higher marginal rates for the rich as desirable in themselves."

This type of progressive conservatism (no pun intended) appealed to Jews who didn't support left-leaning parties like the Liberals and CCF/NDP. It helped the Tories become "the instrument of freedom and justice," as Segal wrote in his autobiography No Surrender, and included a few dashes of populism to boot.

That's the way the Tories used to be, anyway.

Today's right-leaning conservatives, or Blue Tories, are firmly in control of the party's political and economic agenda. Greater emphasis is placed on the principles of smaller government, lower taxes and increased amounts of personal freedom and liberty.

Modern conservatives care about the well-being of all Canadians and always work toward this important goal. That being said, statist programs dealing with collectivism, social justice and progressive taxation are, I'm pleased to say, no longer part of the Tory diet.

Here's another reason: Red Toryism is dead.

There are still Red Tories in Canada, of course. But, as I've written before, Prime Minister Stephen Harper has rebranded Canadian conservatism. This political phenomenon, which I've called "Harpertism," balances Red Toryism with Blue Toryism. The result is Tory centrism, a middle-of-the-road conservatism that's less ideological and much harder to define and attack.

As the Conservatives have changed, so, too, have Jewish Tory MPs, party members and voters. Their needs are different, their beliefs have changed, and their political philosophy is a different colour. ■

Purim for grownups

Sara Horowitz

What child does not love Purim? It has costumes, pageantry, nosherei, merriment, not to mention a story with intrigue, carnivalesque reversals and larger-than-life characters – the buffoon king, the beauty-pageant-worthy Jewish princess, the puffed-up villain, first humbled then defeated. What's not to love?

For adults, however, a darker edge sets in. There's the text itself – a powerful leader led astray by a self-serving adviser governed by hatred, forced induction of young maidens into a large royal harem, a massacre of Jews barely averted, a massacre of enemies of Jews that extended an extra day. Then there's the associated practice of drowning out the name of the villain in our ritual readings of Megillat Esther, linked with the biblical injunction to "blot out" zecher amalek – the memory or trace of the Amalekites, or Amalek.

The traditional Purim Megillah reading comes sandwiched between two Torah readings that contain a confusing injunction to forget. It seems to mandate both remembrance and its opposite. On the Shabbat before Purim, we read God's command to the Israelites: "Remember what the Amalekites did to you… you shall blot out the name of Amalek from under heaven. Do not forget" (Deuteronomy 25:17, 19). In the morning Torah reading of Purim, we read: "Inscribe this in a document as a reminder, and read it aloud… 'I will utterly blot out the memory of Amalek from under the heaven!'" (Exodus 17:14).

Traditional readings of Megillat Esther offer a concrete example of the paradox of remembering to forget. Listeners use all manner of noisemakers to drown out the name of Haman when the reader chants it. Some people have a custom of writing the name Haman on the soles of their shoes, and wiping it out by walking. Think about it. To wipe out Haman's name, we must first inscribe it. Like Amalek, the entity to be forgotten is called by name, anchored by our sacred texts and our ritual acts. The reader needs to chant the name aloud, and the listeners strain to hear it, so the barrage of noise can be launched at just the right moments.

Rabbinic memory associates Amalek with individuals or peoples who act in gratuitously evil ways toward the Jewish people – seeing in Hitler, for example, a genetic or spiritual inheritor of the biblical prototype. Many rabbinic sources make clear that post-biblically, we're not commanded to literally wipe out Amalek or any later nation we see as their genetic or spiritual inheritors. Over time, the idea of "blotting out" Amalek came to be understood either as an act deferred until the end of days, or else as a metaphor – a command to wipe out one's own evil impulse, one's yetzer hara. But the idea of Amalek contains also the whisper of genocide, the trace of trauma, the continued existence of gratuitous evil – in the world, and perhaps in ourselves.

I think of the repeated cycle of naming and blotting out, inscription and erasure, as something akin to Freud's concept of Fort-Da – the way a child makes objects disappear and reappear, to conquer the fear of abandonment or non-being. Similarly, on Purim we turn our fears and trauma into a child's game that brings us to face what most chills us. In this way, perhaps, we are not paralyzed by it – nor are we seduced by it.

Many contemporary Jewish thinkers suggest that erasing the trace of Amalek is accomplished by engaging actively with its ethical opposite. Amalek goes after the helpless and defenceless for the sheer pleasure of experiencing its own power. Negating that would entail accepting a special obligation to look out for the defenceless, to protect and assist the helpless.

It seems clear that we are meant, at least at some level, to live with the memory of Amalek, which is also the memory of trauma. What else could we do but turn it into carnival? ■

Court orders Palestinian groups to pay $655.5 million to victims

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Only a few days before a U.S. court awarded the victims of Palestinian terrorism $655.5 million in damages (all figures US), Fatah, the main component of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), continued to glorify terrorist attacks that claimed dozens of innocent lives.

Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) reported that Fatah, the party of Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas, praised as "heroes" Japanese terrorists who killed 24 in an attack on an Israeli airport in 1972.

Palestinian terrorists who killed eight in an attack on the Hotel Savoy in 1975 were called "heroic self-sacrificing fighters" and a terrorist who planned the 1972 Olympics massacre was dubbed "the Martyr Commander, the Red Prince."

In assigning liability against the PLO and the PA, a jury in Federal District Court in New York dismissed suggestions that the organizations were not linked to six terrorist attacks in Israel from 2002 to 2004 in which Americans were killed. And while the subsequent glorification of terrorist attacks did not prove a liability, payroll records and other documentation did. Evidence submitted in court, some of it provided by PMW, showed that killers were on the PA payroll, that the PA paid the salaries of terrorists in Israeli prisons and made payments to the families of suicide bombers.

Lawyers for the plaintiffs, which included the family of former Toronto native Yechezkel (Chezi) Goldberg, said if the PA and the PLO did not pay the judgment, they would begin the process of seizing PA assets to satisfy the judgment. That could include assets in Canada, said lawyer Aaron Blumenfeld.

The U.S. court decision is "precedent setting. It's huge," said Blumenfeld, a member of the Canadian Coalition Against Terror (CCAT), an advocacy group.

"The main thing is imposing responsibility on the PA. That's been done before. This case is bigger and it involves many more people and events. It shows them for what they are," he said.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the court decision shows that victims "are able to avail themselves of the courts to assign at least partial responsibility to those entities. It is an important decision and could have large implications going forward."

Fogel said the decision "obliges [the two Palestinian entities] to consider the issue in terms of their own responsibility. That's an important image for Canadians to assimilate."

The decision supports the position that it's not just the perpetrators of terrorism who are culpable, but also those who support and finance it, he said, adding that the award could be taken from large sums that the American government transfers to the PA every year.

Blumenfeld said the decision hits the terrorists where it hurts – their pocketbooks. The PLO and the PA make huge investments abroad and these are now subject to seizure to satisfy the judgment, he said.

The United States and other western democracies remain the heartbeat of the world's financial system and the PLO and the PA may have to look elsewhere to get a return on their money, he said.

Blumenfeld noted that the case circumvented the political echelon entirely.

"The courts can force the responsible parties to pay for their wrongdoing, even when the [U.S.] State Department says no, we want Israel to make peace with these people," he said.

Last week's decision wasn't the first finding against the two groups in a terrorism case. In two other cases, default judgments were registered for more than $100 million, but the organizations reached confidential settlements.

Other court decisions found the government of Iran responsible for terrorist attacks. One such ruling led to the seizure of a building in Manhattan worth $500 million. In addition, a wire transfer of more than $1 billion that went through Wall Street was intercepted and frozen, Blumenfeld said.

Aaron Blumenfeld

PA assets in Canada are liable to be seized to pay the judgment, he added.

One of the plaintiffs was the family of Goldberg, a 41-year-old father of seven who was killed in a Jerusalem bus bombing in 2004. His widow, Karen, a native of Brooklyn, testified about the effect of her husband's death on their children. They suffered from depression, anger issues and trouble in school, the New York Times reported.

Their youngest child did not speak until he was three. The first words he uttered were, "Did someone kill my father?" the New York Times reported.

The suicide bomber in that attack was a PA police officer from Bethlehem. Responsibility for the attack was claimed by the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a wing of Fatah, Blumenfeld said.

Victims can also launch their own cases in Canada under the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act, said Blumenfeld, who lobbied for passage of the act as a member of Canadian Coalition Against Terror. ■

Vaccination of children called 'the only responsible course'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Eric Petersiel

Last month, as the number of people infected by the measles virus continued to grow, the Orthodox Union (OU) and the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) issued a statement reminding parents that the vaccination of children can be considered a halachic obligation and "is absolutely the only responsible course of action."

In Toronto, the Vaad Harabonim (council of Orthodox rabbis) has not pronounced on the subject, but Rabbi Dovid Schochet, who serves as the organization's president, said "[children] should get immunized. It's already an old question. They definitely should be immunized."

The question of immunization for childhood diseases has resurfaced this winter as illnesses that were once thought to be conquered have begun to make a comeback. In the United States, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported that the number of cases of measles, which can be fatal, was at a 20-year high. A recent outbreak in California, which originated in Disneyland, affected 123 youngsters as of last week. Most were not vaccinated.

A report in U.S.-based Tablet magazine said five areas in California had "stratospheric rates of unvaccinated or under-immunized kids." Statewide, the vaccine refusal rate is 2.56 per cent, but in the five problematic areas, rates ran from 5.5 per cent at the low end to 13.5 per cent at the high end.

To achieve "herd immunity," in which enough of the general population is immune to protect the unimmunized, a vaccination rate of around 94 per cent should be achieved. Its survey of Jewish schools found 14 of 68 schools with high rates of non-vaccinated children, many around 12 to 18 per cent.

Opponents of vaccination often refer to a study that links vaccinations to autism, though that study has been debunked and its author stripped of his licence to practise medicine in Britain.

In Canada, Toronto Public Health reported 10 cases of measles in the city. In all, there are 17 cases province-wide. Toronto Public Health reported the city-wide non-vaccination rate at two per cent, but one school, ALPHA Alternative junior school, had an exemption rate of 38.8 per cent.

Bais Chaya Mushka, a Chabad girls school, reported a 13.7 per cent exemption rate for diphtheria, tetanus and pertussis immunizations and a 13.1 per cent exemption rate for measles, mumps and rubella.

Bais Brucha Girls school, a Bobov institution, reported exemptions totaling 8.1 per cent – 13 of 154 students.

Rabbi Nochum Sosover, executive director of Bais Chaya Mushka, said the rates reported by Toronto Health are not representative of the real rate of immunization in the school. Only a few families have signed documents asking for an exemption from vaccinations, he said. The other parents have either vaccinated their children but don't have the most up to date documentation or are a little behind in the vaccinations and will have their children immunized.

At any rate, he said, "we are not medical authorities to tell their parents if they should vaccinate their children or not. All we do is follow the reporting process."

At Robbins Hebrew Academy, which has 365 students, "we have one family that is not immunized," said Claire Sumerlus, head of school.

Eric Petersiel, head of school at Leo Baeck Day School, said of the school's 900 students at the north and south branches, only one to two per cent (15 to 20) youngsters, have opted out of immunization.

Last week, Elliott Brodkin, executive director and CFO of Associated Hebrew Schools, sent an email to parents saying the school was co-operating with health authorities in Toronto and York Region "to ensure the health and well-being of students and other members of the school community.

"Immunization is the best defence against measles infection. Two doses of measles-containing vaccine are required for full protection. Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto has high immunization rates amongst its students. We require that all students submit their immunization records upon application to the school and we actively collect immunization records from students once they are admitted."

In their statements on vaccinations, the OU and the RCA noted that it's the responsibility of parents to have their children vaccinated. "As in many communities, a small minority of parents chooses not to do so. The ongoing measles outbreak demonstrates how this could bear very serious consequences, not only for their own children, but others' too, especially those medically unable to be vaccinated." ■

Tomas Fleischmann's recipe column is part of the deal.

HOWARD COSELL
SOMEWHAT SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In a deadline day trade move that caught television analysts completely by surprise, the Florida Panthers announced they had acquired the NHL rights to slick forward Paul Lungen.

"Though he's been out of hockey for 20 years, and never played anything beyond intra-mural hockey, Lungen brings the franchise immediate credibility," said longtime Panthers managing general Dale "The Dealmaker" Taloon. "His math hockey knowledge alone makes the team 0.036 per cent better."

Contacted at his mid-Toronto home, where he was shovelling his driveway for the 432nd time this winter, Lungen, a longtime CJN reporter, said he saw the move coming.

"I was in Florida recently," he said, "and I believe one of the team's scouts lived in the same Del Boca Vista complex where I was staying. He saw me power walking in the community and must have been impressed with my stride and speed. Also that I knew what Corsi and Fenwick meant."

"My last experience in the rink came during Game 5 of the 2011 Stanley Cup playoffs in Vancouver. The Canucks' Tanner Glass whiffed on a shot into an open net and my friend immediately said, 'Even you could have scored that goal.'

"Before that, I famously heckled a coach from behind the bench, telling him I had my skates in the car and I could be suited up for the next period if he needed me."

"I played more often when I was younger," said the middle-aged, out-of-shape Lungen. "Once in high school I was at a community centre skipping school and I signed autographs for a bunch of five- and six-year-olds who thought I was Gordie Howe. I told them I was Mr. Hooky and they must have thought I said Mr. Hockey. I later saw one of the autographs sell for $400 on eBay."

To complete the deal, the Panthers are sending Tomas Fleischmann to The CJN. Fleischmann is expected to bring his recipe for margarine to the newspaper, as well as write a weekly recipe column. ■

Sephardi delegation heads to Ottawa to meet PM

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

For the first time in Canadian history, an official delegation of Sephardi community leaders, activists, philanthropists and spiritual leaders from across the country visited Parliament Hill and met with the prime minister, ambassadors and other dignitaries.

Organized by B'nai Brith Canada and the Sephardic Legacy Institute, the trip took about 30 Sephardi leaders to Ottawa on Feb. 26 to educate Canada's political leaders about the Sephardi community and testify before the parliamentary committee on human rights regarding the threat posed by the current Iranian regime.

Speaking with The CJN in advance of the trip, Yehuda Azoulay, founder of the Sephardic Legacy Institute, whose goal is to preserve Sephardi heritage, explained that he, as well as David Matas, a human rights lawyer based in Winnipeg, will testify before the Foreign Affairs subcommitee on human rights about Iran's aim to wipe Israel off the map and to obtain nuclear weapons.

"People are coming from Toronto, Vancouver, Ottawa, Montreal and Winnipeg representing Canadian Sephardi Jewry for the first time," Azoulay said, adding that the itinerary also includes meetings with the national Defence Minister Jason Kenney and Liberal MP Irwin Cotler.

"We want to create a relationship between the government of Canada and Sephardi communities across Canada," Azoulay said.

"There are 380,000 Jews in Canada, 50,000 to 60,000 of whom are Sephardi, so therefore, we carry a lot of weight and we could influence many different things."

He said seven members of the delegation – B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn, B'nai Brith president Henry Schnurbach, Toronto-based financial industry consultant Eric Benchetrit, Montreal-based entrepreneur Steve Maman, Communauté Juive Marocaine de Toronto president Simon Keslassy and Rabbi Ilan Acoca, spiritual leader of Vancouver's Beit Hamidrash Synagogue – were granted a private, half-hour meeting with Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

"We'll be discussing securities for the Jewish community in general, and the Sephardi community," Azoulay said

Rabbi Acoca said one of the issues to be discussed throughout the visit to Parliament Hill is the fact that Sephardi Jews, many of whom were forced to emigrate from Muslim countries, should be considered refugees.

"History has shown that Sephardi Jews have been forgotten," said Rabbi Acoca, who serves about 100 families at his Vancouver shul.

"Just recently in Israel the government decided there is going to be a memorial day for Jews from Muslim countries on Nov. 30. It will recognize that Sephardi Jews contributed to the Jewish world and society in general, but more than that, we are refugees as well," he said.

"It is important for people to know... that as the [Sephardi community] is getting older, they are not being forgotten, so this trip is going to be done in their honour and in the memory of the people who fled from Muslim countries because they were forced to."

Rabbi Acoca said that having served the only Sephardi congregation west of Toronto for the past 15 years, he understands how important it is to keep the Sephardi tradition alive in Western Canada and the rest of the world.

"I'm also looking forward to meeting dignitaries and ministers and to let them know that this is who we are. We are Sephardi Jews, we are part of the Jewish world, we are here, we are alive and existing, and they should be educated about it," said Rabbi Acoca, who is also the head of the Rabbinical Council of America's Sephardic Affinity Group.

In addition to being part of a delegation that is working to build a partnership with the Canadian government, Rabbi Acoca said he's also looking forward to connecting with other Jewish leaders across the country.

"I'm honoured to be part of this delegation. It's a historical moment for Canada." ■

Young professionals network for a cause

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There's no telling to where introductions can lead.

Providing a professional networking platform and building social exchange, 37 mentors, trendsetters and industry leaders mingled with some 280 young professionals at the fifth annual Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) Revolving Tables event, held Feb. 25 at the Four Seasons Hotel. More than $135,000 was raised for the cause.

"Mentorship is a two-way street. We are just setting the participants up to make the first move. Having a mentor to guide you along in your career can make all the difference," said event co-chair Jamie Grundman.

"One hundred per cent of the funds raised tonight go to every major hospital and scientific research institution in Israel," said ICRF Toronto president Norman Shiner.

This year, ICRF is marking its 40th year of investing in scientific research in Israel.

"We have seen incredible advances in cancer research by our scientists, some of whom have received judicious awards, including the Nobel Prize," said Kyle Lichtman, past Revolving Tables co-chair and an ICRF Toronto board member.

Youthful exuberance, big questions, business cards, and shared industry stories were exchanged in anticipation of sitting down with event mentors over a three-course dinner.

After each course, participants switched to a new table with a new mentor, asking questions about work/life balance, staying inspired and unlocking one's potential.

Participant Debra Fabian, a teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools, came to the event with an open mind.

"I like to listen to people's stories and hear how they got to where they are and learn about their pathways, as a lot of times, those are unconventional. I think it's inspiring to hear of people who had an idea and who were somehow able to make it happen," she said.

When asked why the Revolving Tables event is important, Grundman said, "Young professionals are a crucial demographic for charities. These are the donors of tomorrow. Opening them up to the cause of the ICRF, and showing both them and the CEOs in attendance what a big impact a small organization such as the ICRF can have is very important.

"People come to the event because the chance to network with the likes of Heather Reisman [founder, chair and CEO of Indigo], Jordan Banks [global head of vertical strategy and managing director, Facebook Canada] or Ellis Jacob, [president and CEO, Cineplex Entertainment], is very attractive. But, I also think the event is a testament to the impact a young person can have on an organization. If even one person leaves wanting to involve himself or herself in a charity, it has been a success."

Young professionals from last year's event expressed a deep interest in speaking with other young entrepreneurs with proven business success stories.

"This year, we were more active in recruiting young entrepreneurs such as Leerom Segal, co-founder and CEO of Klick Health and New York Times best-selling author, and Josh Singer, president of Kognitive Marketing," said Jacob.

Some of the other moderators and mentors included Joseph Mapa, president and CEO, Mount Sinai Hospital; Elise Kalles, of Harvey Kalles Real Estate; Ken Tanenbaum, vice-chairman, Kilmer Van Nostrand Co. Ltd.; Gabe Gonda, head of features and weekend, the Globe and Mail; and Natasha Koifman, president, NKPR Inc.

TV personality and fashion writer Jeanne Beker shared her pearls of wisdom with a table of eager young professionals:

"If you think you have arrived, it's time to go. You really need to keep on going, and make yourself relevant, and present yourself with new challenges."

Asked if there was a defining moment in her career where she had to make a choice that led her to her present path, Beker replied, "I think everyday choices come into your life. If you are really out there living a big life, your antennae are out and your mind is open to possibilities, they come fast and furious." ■

Limmud Toronto targets young adults with diverse speakers list

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Limmud, an international Jewish learning festival that promotes Judaism's rich history, culture and heritage, will present 85 rabbis, professors and community leaders who will speak about issues relevant to Toronto's young professionals.

Limmud Toronto, which was founded in 2007 by a British-born volunteer named Peter Sevitt and modelled after Britain's 30-year-old Limmud educators' conference attended by about 2,500 people annually, will be held March 8 at the Alliance Francaise Toronto.

"This is a very diverse program with an emphasis on young adults, on speakers that would attract young adults," said Sara Dobner, Limmud Toronto's programming co-chair, adding that this is the first Limmud event in Toronto since 2009.

"It's a grassroots, non-profit organization, which is dedicated to connecting Jews of all ages and affiliations through volunteerism and cross-communal learning."

Dobner said there will be nine concurrent sessions running each hour, in nine different categories.

Topics will include art, music, the Bible and Talmud, Israel, health, Jewish history, Jewish identity and education, Jewish values and philosophy, social activism and politics, and literature.

"So each hour, if one wants to attend sessions about Israel only, or Jewish culture, they can go along with one category throughout the day. Everyone can find whatever they're interested in," she said.

Dobner also praised her programming co-chair, Rebecca Ihilchik, with whom she worked very closely to bring a diversity of subject matter to the event.

"Each one of us brought a different perspective to the program. I brought a lot of Israeli-related programs... Rebecca brought a lot of speakers to promote inclusion and feminism, so she put panels together on these issues," she said.

"That's why were able to put together such a diverse program that would be inclusive and everyone will be able to find something in it."

Some of the sessions offered include "Inside The CJN" with CJN editor Yoni Goldstein; "Is Religion Killing Judaism?" presented by Jews for Judaism's director of education Rabbi Michael Skobac; and "What Does Judaism Say About the Afterlife?" with Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto.

Sara Dobner

"One session is with DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general, and it's an open discussion. It's everything you want to ask," Dobner said.

There will also be panel discussions, such as "Judaism and Feminism – Challenges, Triumphs, and the Future;" and "Special Needs Inclusion in the Jewish Community."

Dobner will be moderating a panel discussion called "When Tel Aviv Meets Toronto: Complementing or Clashing Cultures?"

"This will be a session in Hebrew, and it will bring different people, all Israeli, to talk about different aspects of their experience about the different cultures and how they interact," she said.

"I think this event is very unique because it is one day where people can take the time and devote the day to learning... It's a great way to meet people and mingle and to learn from each other."

The presenters themselves are among the 500 participants that are expected to attend.

Organizers of the day-long conference will also accommodate young families by offering programming for kids between four and 12 years old.

Dobner said she hopes Limmud Toronto will become an annual event. ■

Local rabbi admits to digging 'tunnel' near York University

SOL TEDOLSKY
EXTRA SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rabbi Herschel Herschenhorn

An elderly Toronto rabbi has admitted to digging the recently discovered tunnel near York University, saying he took it upon himself to start rebuilding the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre because he got fed up waiting for construction to begin.

The tunnel, which is actually more of a seven-metre-long, three-metre-deep bunker, was discovered in January by a conservation worker.

It took three years to dig out "literally with my own two hands," said Rabbi Herschel Herschenhorn, 95, rabbi emeritus of Beth Aaron Bais Chaim Hebrew Men of Oshawa.

"I'm in pretty good shape for a man my age, but it was a big job, and none of my former congregants wanted to help," he said.

"Just wait until they ask me to officiate at their grandkids' bar mitzvahs, just because they don't like the new guy and how he keeps sermonizing about shmittah and the laws of family purity. I can tell you right now what my answer will be."

The 50-year-old BJCC was torn down in 2009 and was originally scheduled to have been replaced by 2011 with a $150-million facility, but the start date has been repeatedly delayed after community officials failed to raise the funds needed to break ground on the project.

Only the first phase of the new centre has been completed, leaving what Rabbi Herschenhorn calls a "forlorn, seemingly endless patch of green grass" covering most of the land where the BJCC once stood. "It's like the empty shmittah fields my successor keeps yapping about."

The rabbi said he purposely chose the wooded area near York University and the Rexall Tennis Centre because it physically resembles the West Don Valley floodplain where the old BJCC was located, and not because he was confused or suffering from dementia (though he conceded that he does get lost in Earl Bales Park from time to time).

He also denied choosing the location because he was planning to disrupt competition at the nearby tennis venue for this summer's Pan Am Games, but said his choice of location was oddly appropriate for reasons other than geography.

"Tennis is about the only thing in the Pan Am Games that even remotely interests me," he said, noting that he tries to play two or three times a week, and that before becoming a ba'al tshuvah and entering the rabbinate in the early 1960s, he once barnstormed Europe with Bobby Riggs as half of a tennis hustling team that specialized in swindling female members of European royal families out of their inheritances.

When asked how he had managed to excavate such a large hole without being detected, Rabbi Herschenhorn said he carried the dirt away from the site using his tallis bag, so as not to arouse suspicion among nearby residents or the small army of security personnel readying the Rexall site for the Games.

"They [the security people] didn't seem like the sharpest knives in the drawer. I certainly wouldn't have believed my story about holy dirt," Rabbi Hirschenhorn said.

"After speaking to those shmoes, I've lost all confidence in the security for the Games. I told my grandkids to stay away from the popular events like tennis and basketball, and stick to the velodrome or Ping-Pong if they absolutely feel the need to go see something."

He said he has since written to Games organizers suggesting they use the Jewish Defence League for security.

"Those guys have real dirt in their tallis bags, if you know what I mean," he said cryptically.

Rabbi Herschenhorn said he hadn't abandoned the effort when he stopped digging in late December, only that he was taking a rest. "Give me a break. I just turned 95. And like I said, my former congregants are lazy."

He figures that at the rate he was going, he could rebuild the entire BJCC before he turns 105, which, he emphasized, is still sooner than the latest official projected completion date of June 2030.

Toronto Police and CSIS refused to comment on the rabbi's admission, saying the investigation is ongoing, while a spokesperson in the prime minister's office said it was too early to rule out Islamic extremism.

The York Federation of Students responded with a statement blaming Israel, because, it said, Israel is responsible for everything. ■

Hebrew U professor says Israeli vote too close to call

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

With only a few weeks left until Israelis head to the polls, security remains the dominant electoral issue, though they remain divided on how to best tackle the problem, says a renowned political science professor in Jerusalem.

Prof. Reuven Hazan, head of the political science department at Hebrew University and a respected adviser to the Israeli government, said the March 17 election is neck and neck between "the hawks and the doves." Both sides see security as key, he said, but have different approaches to making Israelis feel safe.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's hawkish Likud party has released buzzed-about campaign videos that suggest voters who do not side with Likud could play into the hands of Israel's enemies.

"[Likud] says in the bluntest terms that the Arab world doesn't want the State of Israel to exist," Hazan said in a Skype address to a gathering of around 50 people Feb. 21 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

"[The party says] we need to send out a message to the countries surrounding us... If they attack us again, they will lose more land, like they did in 1967."

On the other side of Israel's political spectrum is the Labor-Hatnua alliance, led by Isaac Herzog and Tzipi Livni, who are campaigning on their willingness to tackle economic reform, as well as deliver peace talks with the Palestinians.

"The doves are those parties who say that Israel cannot live by the sword forever," Hazan said.

Unlike Canada's electoral process, the proportion of the votes each party receives in Israeli elections determines the number of seats it gets in the Knesset.

With Likud and Labor-Hatnua polling at about 20 per cent each, it will be up to their leaders to negotiate with other parties to form a coalition. The goal is to get at least 61 of the Knesset's 120 seats.

Hazan said he expects a larger turnout for Israel's Arab population, which comprises 20 per cent of the country's population.

"They are a sect within Israel society that usually doesn't poll well," Hazan noted. Israeli Arab parties currently have 11 MKs, less than 10 per cent of the total seats.

In this election, Israeli Arab parties are running as a unified bloc, which should ensure they become better represented, and more support for this minority could benefit the more left-wing Labor-Hatnua, he said.

Reuven Hazan

Another rising group to keep an eye on is a new party, Kulanu, led by former Likud minister Moshe Kahlon. Even with security demands, the centre-right party also wants to focus on the economy.

Although security is the defining issue of this election, it's not the only thing Israelis are worried about, Hazan said. Israel's economy remains very important for the middle class.

"Housing prices have skyrocketed [in Israel] and the cost of living has increased dramatically," Hazan said. "Kahlon [wants to] focus on a domestic economic agenda, on alleviating the burden of the middle class."

As these economy-focused parties rise in popularity, others are losing some of their influence, Hazan said.

These include Yair Lapid's centrist Yesh Atid Party, which won second place in the 2013 Israeli election. Meanwhile, Shas, an ultra-Orthodox party, is also projected to get fewer seats this time.

Netanyahu's hardline stance still attracts a lot of support, although since the end of the conflict with Hamas in Gaza last summer, his approval rating has fallen, Hazan noted.

The political divide in Israel has only deepened since Netanyahu decided to address the U.S. Congress on March 3 to discuss Iran's nuclear program. Hazan said Netanyahu's address to the U.S. Congress could turn Israel into a partisan issue in the United States.

"I do not think [Netanyahu's address] is good for the long-term relations between Israel and the United States," Hazan said. "Netanyahu is, in my mind, overly playing the role of Israeli politics in American politics." ■

Ninth of Adar revived as day of constructive conflict

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

For most Jews, the ninth of Adar is a Hebrew calendar date like any other.

However, on that day some 2,000 years ago, the houses of Hillel and Shammai, then leading sages who founded opposing schools of Jewish thought, erupted in bloody conflict, and a disagreement between the two houses over 18 pivotal Jewish legal matters led to the violent deaths of 3,000 students.

Though initially declared a fast day, mainstream Jewry has long since discarded the practice.

But a burgeoning movement, initiated three years ago by Rabbi Daniel Roth of Jerusalem's Pardes Center for Judaism and Conflict Resolution and lately taken up by several young Toronto Jews, is pushing to re-appropriate the ninth of Adar as a Jewish day of constructive conflict.

On Feb. 28, several organizers, along with representatives from downtown organizations such as Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism, the study group BASE – Beit Midrash Downtown Toronto and The Orchard: Intentional Jewish Communal House – hosted an evening of study and discussion about ways to transform the historical day of destructive conflict into one that nurtures healthy disagreement.

Toronto's 9 Adar event was spearheaded by Evelyn Tauben, 36, a producer and curator who primarily works with Jewish artists.

After taking a class with Rabbi Roth at Pardes several years ago, she was inspired to bring the event to Toronto.

"I reached out to different people," Tauben said, "like fellow organizer Samahra Zatzman, who has also studied with Rabbi Roth, as well as Rabbi Aaron Levy and people from The Orchard, who I know are open to doing different things, and this unexpected team of us came together saying, 'There's a global ninth Adar initiative. Toronto should be a part of it.'"

She added: "The basic message [of the day] is that conflict exists, and we don't want to pretend there aren't disagreements in relationships. The day is not just about how we can speak more productively about Israel and Palestine, though that's part of it, but also how we, in our daily lives, our homes and families – in the Jewish and wider communities – use Jewish texts to learn how to work through conflict more productively."

Roth's message is that disagreements managed constructively ensure healthy and dynamic relationships and communities, and that Israel and the Jewish People, particularly given current challenges, can benefit from learning to better navigate conflict.

His challenge to do this is being taken up by Jewish groups across Israel and North America, including Israeli students, organizations that facilitate constructive dialogue about Israel such as the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the Israel Talks and Encounter, and in Jewish day schools across the United States, some of which are taking part in the Pardes Rodef Shalom school program.

The Toronto 9 Adar event, held at The Orchard, near Bathurst and Dupont streets, was attended by about a dozen people, mostly in their 20s and 30s, and kicked off with a musical Havdalah service.

Participants then verbally agreed to a "Rodef shalom (pursuers of peace) Communication Agreement," compiled by Rabbi Roth, which contained passages about respectful communication from various Jewish texts.

One read: "I will feel free to continue to express, and allow for others to express, different viewpoints in the spirit of machloket leshem shamayim (disputes for the sake of heaven) as the Mishnah (Ethics of Our Fathers, 5:17) describes the dispute between Beit Shammai and Beit Hillel."

The group then broke into chevrutah-style pairs to study an assortment of Jewish texts on disputes and conflict resolution before engaging in a group discussion led by Rabbi Aaron Levy of Makom.

That conversation included an exploration of what constitutes an "argument for the sake of heaven," which, Tauben said, "is elevating, or productive." ■

CRAFTING NEW LEGISLATION TO MEET THE CHALLENGE OF THE SUPREME COURT DECISION

Family Matters
by
John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
for 33 years

Recently the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the criminal law in Canada forbidding assisted suicide was unconstitutional and gave the Federal government one year to develop a new law to replace it. By contrast, Jewish law traditionally forbids assisted suicide and calls it murder, although there is one halachic authority in commentaries to the Shulchan Aruch (Code of Jewish Law) for not hindering death. We will not debate the merits of this ruling. Irrespective of such differences and the merits of the ruling, Mr. Harper now has a big problem. His Government will now be obliged to worry about many of the same considerations that family and estate lawyers often consider when assessing a client's mental capacity when interviewing him concerning his instructions before signing a legal document, such as a Will or Release. So here are a few questions Mr. Harper needs to consider:

1. When a patient makes such a request, just who will be qualified to assess his consent, what are the qualifications of such a person beyond having a medical degree, and what are the conditions by which that consent is to be judged? Even if it's to be two doctors should at least one be a psychiatrist with training in capacity assessments? In Ontario, if I have any doubt about someone's mental capacity, I turn to a specified list of licensed "capacity assessors"; some are psychologists, some are psychiatrists -- others social workers. But the key fact here is that they are all licensed by the Ontario government and trained for such a role.

2. Will the people who are potentially influencing the patient be considered when such a request is made by a disabled person who may be partially medicated or in a weaker state of mind by reason of the pain they are experiencing? I have had people come to me for assistance who have been badly abused or in distress but my efforts are sometimes frustrated by friends or relatives with their own agendas and not always for monetary gain, such as a future inheritance. So some clients will resist my advice because of such outside influences. Family law lawyers call these people 'cheerleaders' who give advice without knowing all the facts or the law, often subtly or sometimes forcefully. They may be well-meaning or distracted by misplaced empathy or they cannot tolerate the pain in which a friend or relative suffers. Such people will often want the client to take disastrous "shortcuts." By analogy, how will the new Legislation deal with such cheerleaders and protect the weak from making an irreversible decision?

3. Just who will be doing the killing? Which doctors or nurses will be qualified? And how will such a professional be properly insured and be legally protected if some relative or spouse later claims that his or her loved one never gave proper consent because they were not in their right mind or were improperly influenced? And who will legally protect the "killer" from accusations that he or she didn't apply the "correct" legislative or regulatory standards?

I think we should all pray for Mr. Harper as the new law will need a great deal of very careful thought. Someone's innocent life depends on it.

End-of-life, palliative care discussed by expert panel

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dr. Daphna Grossman and Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner on the legal, medical and ethical perspectives on end of life matters.

People's wishes for end-of-life care are more likely to be honoured if they make clear plans for their deaths and share them, according to a panel of experts who recently addressed legal, medical and ethical questions associated with the final stages of life.

An information session with Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner, palliative care specialist Dr. Daphna Grossman and lawyer Brendan Donovan, was held Feb. 24 at North York Memorial Community Hall and attended by more than 100 people. Criminal lawyer Edward Prutschi moderated the town-hall-style meeting, which was sponsored by UJA Health Professionals, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus.

In dealing with legal matters pertaining to end-of-life planning, Donovan, an estates and trusts litigator at Wagner Sidlofsky LLP, stressed the importance of a detailed written plan for one's end of life wishes. He said writing something such as "no heroic measures" is an ambiguous instruction that could be open to interpretation, which is why detailed instructions are necessary.

Another legal matter is the determination of an individual's competency in making a treatment decision and understanding the consequences. He said competency is of particular importance, given the recent Supreme Court ruling that struck down the ban on physician-assisted death.

Donovan recommended assigning a power of attorney for personal care, which he likened to a living will. A designated person becomes the substitute decision-maker (SDM), a trusted person who can follow through on an individual's health-care or end-of-life wishes if he or she becomes mentally incapacitated.

Grossman, deputy head of palliative care at Baycrest Health Sciences, dispelled the misconception that palliative care hastens death. Dying is a natural part of life, she said, explaining that palliative care helps a cancer patient "be more comfortable and less anxious" when no more treatment can be offered. "Palliative care helps the patient to live with dignity through the trajectory of the illness and to die with dignity."

She said a study in the New England Journal of Medicine showed that palliative care does not hasten death.

Grossman noted that morphine, a drug common used in palliative care, alleviates shortness of breath, pain and anxiety.

Palliative care is also provided to people with non-terminal illnesses such as chronic lung and heart disease and amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS), she said.

"There was a time when people died quickly and at young ages from these illnesses. Medical care and procedures has helped people live longer."

Palliative care may be necessary for dementia patients in the last six months of their lives, when their level of consciousness decreases and they have increasing difficulty swallowing.

She said that people who ask to die are often socially isolated and/or have undiagnosed depression. "Some people rescind this request once their [psychological] needs are met."

Rabbi Torczyner, rosh kollel of Toronto's Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov, noted there is a diversity of Jewish opinions on dealing with death, so he advised people to speak to their rabbis.

He said in Judaism, there's a requirement to save life and mitigate pain. He acknowledged that death from medication is an acceptable risk, if the goal is pain alleviation, but he made it clear that euthanasia, the administration of medication to deliberately end life, is a violation of Halachah.

The rabbi said people have the right to refuse treatment if the pain of a terminal illness can't be abated or if there are low odds of success for a particular treatment. He also said it's not necessary to prolong a life of pain caused by a terminal disease by treating a secondary condition such as a respiratory infection. "We don't extend a life of pain."

When it comes to end-of-life care, Rabbi Torczyner noted that there could be a "set of competing values" between what families want and what medical staff deem necessary. "Doctors are asked to represent the system. They are the guardians of resources in the health care system, which could be a conflict of interest."

However, he added that families and patients who view physicians with suspicion must also appreciate the fact that physicians are in the business of providing health care. "Doctors do not go into this field to end life." ■

Media control not crucial for Jewish millennials

SHLOIMI MANDELBAUM
NOT SO SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Jewish community leaders are concerned that young professionals of the millennial generation are not as committed to maintaining their grip on the worldwide media as the generations before them.

"Jewish youth are much too focused on their careers, relationships, and promoting social justice issues, and simply don't make media control a priority," said Deborah Livshitz, founder of Jewish Media Group.

Livshitz explained that Jewish media control peaked in 1996 when 90 per cent of media outlets were run by power hungry machers, but the rate has been on a downward spiral ever since.

"These days, the number is at, like, 72 per cent, at best."

According to a UIA report that polled nearly 1,500 Canadian Jews between the ages of 20 and 40, only 32 per cent of Jews felt that promoting the narrative of the Zionist entity and Jewish Lobby was "of great importance."

However, Livshitz said she was encouraged that 87 per cent of those surveyed agreed that Jewish control over the banks and Hollywood is essential to Jewish continuity.

The decline in Jewish influence of the media can be evidenced by BBC's decision in January to ask a panel if it is time to "lay the Holocaust to rest," during a debate segment called The Big Questions.

"In my time, the Jews would never have let that happen," said Moshe Dickstein, a concerned parent to two "good, Jewish boys" in their 20s.

"My father, and my father's father understood the importance of Jewish media control, and those lessons were passed down to me. If my children don't learn the skills necessary to influence the public perception via the media, who will continue to make the goyim feel guilty about the Holocaust myth? Did I say, myth? I meant Holocaust exaggeration."

Today, CBS is owned by Sumner Murray Rothstein, a rich Jew. NBC is owned by Brian Roberts, another rich Jew.

CNN, along with Time and People Magazine, which are under the umbrella of Time-Warner, is partially owned by a very rich Israeli named Aviv Nevo.

"Don't get me wrong, Jews still hold most of the positions of power in the media. They're just not a die-hard Zionist-y as I'd like them to be," Livshitz said.

"I mean, we still have Rupert Murdoch – the CEO of FOX and owner of the New York Post – on our side, but he's not even a Jew! So, I don't know anymore."

Rabbi Courtney Fleishman, "the Reform rabbi to the stars," said the fact that young Jews aren't as interested in world domination as their parents were is a worrisome trend.

"I believe that we are now at one of those critical, pivotal moments in our history. It's sneaking up on us. What is happening is an upheaval that threatens our cohesive fabric," she said.

Dickstein's 28-year-old son, Howard, said although it's a nice idea to have the next generation of Jews as invested in media control as the generations that have passed, Jewish youth have bigger problems.

"At this point I'm just trying to figure out how to afford a $600,000 mortgage, working 60 hours a week for a $37,000 salary, and still find time to binge watch Game of Thrones," he said.

"Millennials, who in time will come to be the leaders of the Jewish community, do not at present buy into the importance of running the media and Hollywood as their parents did. I don't know about you, but I have not had my fill of Holocaust movies," Rabbi Fleishman said.

She said the best shot at capturing the imagination of the next generation is to acknowledge them as individuals and approach them one by one.

"Make them understand the value of world domination and how it will benefit them and their children." ■

Anti-Israel QuAIA 'will not be missed': Jewish leaders

JODIE SHUPAC

Jewish community leaders reacted with both triumph and relief at the news the pro-Palestinian group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) has decided to disband after seven years in operation.

In a statement posted on the activist group's website Feb. 26, QuAIA, which has for years been enmeshed in controversy for its participation in the annual Toronto Pride Parade, announced that it will "officially retire at the end of the month."

It said that QuAIA's resources have been "stretched" as most of its original members are currently working "within a variety of fields and organizations within Toronto and internationally" and that, "over the past year... the deteriorating situation in the Middle East, Canada's involvement in attempts to suppress the movement for boycott, divestment and sanctions against Israel... have pulled activist energies in many directions."

Representatives from Jewish organizations, as well as Jewish Toronto city councillor James Pasternak, responded to the news by reiterating their condemnation of QuAIA and its presence at the annual city-funded Pride Parade.

"We are not at all surprised they decided to disband. We have always maintained there is no room in the Pride Parade for QuAIA's discriminatory messages," said Justine Apple, who, as executive director of the Jewish LGBTQ group Kulanu Toronto, has vocally opposed QuAIA's participation in Pride for several years.

"QuAIA's demise is not just a win for the Jewish community, but for every rational human being who understands how little support or merit this fringe group had," Avi Benlolo, president and CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, said in a statement.

"With ISIS beheading every minority in their path, massacres in Syria and Iran executing gay people, QuAIA's obscene obsession with Israel could not hope to win widespread support... Its presence will not be missed."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said that, "QuAIA's decision to disband reaffirms what most people have known all along. Their sole purpose was to spew anti-Israel rhetoric and create an atmosphere of hostility. Their message never resonated with the broader community, most of whom fully understand that Israel is in fact the beacon of hope and protection for the LGBTQ community in [the Middle East]."

Pasternak, the councillor for Ward 10, who has spoken out against QuAIA for years and in 2012 pushed for the term "Israeli apartheid" to be condemned by city council, expressed "cautious relief" at reports the group is breaking up.

"Over the past several years," he said, "QuAIA has caused great pain to many communities in our city through their discrimination, bullying and demonization. Their attempts to march in Toronto's Pride Parade have been... a shameful mark on our city's reputation."

QuAIA has been a divisive force at Pride ever since the group formed during Israeli Apartheid Week at the University of Toronto in 2008.

It was established, it says on its website, in response to "Israel's use of gay rights to divert international attention away from the state's violation of Palestinian rights."

In 2010, pro-Israel groups fought to have the city de-fund Pride Toronto if Pride allowed QuAIA to march in the parade, and, as a result, the group was initially banned.

But Pride Toronto reversed its decision after a backlash from the local queer community.

In 2011, the non-partisan Toronto city manager Joe Pennachetti released a report concluding that the phrase "Israeli apartheid" does not amount to a hate crime, nor does it violate the city's anti-discrimination policy or the Ontario human rights code. City council voted to accept the report.

QuAIA, however, decided not to take part in the parade that year so as not to endanger Pride's funding from the city, though it did take part in the event over the next three years.

Last year, city council approved $160,500 in funding for Pride Toronto, an increase of $20,540 over the previous year. However, the budget passed with an amendment introduced by Pasternak requiring that groups receiving cultural funding understand that the failure to comply with the city's anti-discrimination policy could result in the forfeiture of current and future money.

It also asked council to "affirm its view that Toronto remain a destination of respect, tolerance and safety, and that the importation of world conflict zones is contrary to these ideals."

In 2013, in response to the controversy around QuAIA, City Council voted to amend its anti-discrimination policy to prohibit groups from receiving funds from the city if they tolerate hate speech or discriminatory behaviour.

A Pride Toronto spokesperson told The CJN that Pride is declining to comment on QuAIA's demise at this time.

In its statement, QuAIA said its accomplishments have included "educating Canadians about the conditions of occupation and apartheid policies in Israel and the occupied Palestinian territories" and building " connections and coalitions with other movements for social justice (feminists, anti-tar sands activists, First Nations, etc.)."

Group member Tim McCaskell wrote that retiring QuAIA "allows us all to develop new strategies for supporting the Palestine solidarity movement and make new links across oppressions in our communities."

Requests for an interview with QuAIA representatives were not answered. ■

A proudly Canadian Haggadah designed for all Jews

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A new Haggadah in Hebrew, English and French has been created by Canadians for Canadians and celebrates the Jewish experience in this country.

The Canadian Haggadah Canadienne, compiled and edited by Rabbi Adam Scheier and Richard Marceau, has been published by Montreal's Congregation Shaar Hashomayim. The authors of this Passover text describe it as the first of its kind, and one overdue for a Jewish community that is not only one of the largest in the world, but has a distinct identity.

All text is equally reproduced in the three languages, but what really makes this book stand out are dozens of historic photos of Canadian Jewish life from the early 20th century culled from the Canadian Jewish Congress Archives and other community archives, including those of The CJN.

The book also includes commentaries from 20 rabbis (and one maharat, the title for ordained female clergy in modern Orthodoxy) from across the country and the denominational spectrum.

The text is traditional, said Rabbi Scheier, but it's one he believes is familiar to almost everyone and may be used in full or abbreviated. The language is close to gender neutral.

One small addition is a prayer for Canada, alongside one for the State of Israel: "May the Merciful One bless Canada and its government, and grant fellowship and freedom to all of its inhabitants."

Marceau and Rabbi Scheier, who are friends and colleagues in community work, laboured on the Haggadah for about five years, in their spare time away from busy professional and family lives.

They both enjoy having diverse guests at their seder tables – anglophones and francophones – and felt the lack of a bilingual Haggadah. Extemporaneous translation or using two versions proved to be awkward.

They may seem like an odd pair to produce such a proudly Canadian work. Rabbi Scheier, the Shaar Hashomayim's spiritual leader, is a Rochester, N.Y., native, a fourth-generation American, who came to Canada 11 years ago.

Marceau is general counsel and senior government adviser to the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, based in Ottawa. He is a convert to Judaism, a francophone from Quebec City who was a Bloc Québécois MP from 1997 to 2006. He recounted his journey to Judaism in the 2011 memoir Juif: Une histoire québécoise, which was later translated into English.

"When I came to Montreal, I was struck by the sense of pride Jews had in this country and their history in it," said Rabbi Scheier, who notes his wife, Abby, is Canadian and that they have "produced four Canadian citizens," to whom he dedicates the Haggadah.

The completion of the project is bittersweet for Marceau. He dedicates the book to his late wife, Lori Beckerman, who passed away without seeing it published, and their two children.

Marceau attended his first seder in 1992 with Toronto native Beckerman's family and friends. It was his introduction to a Jewish ritual, which was totally strange to him, but it was made even more baffling because his English was not strong at the time.

"It was quite a culture shock," he recalled.

They were married two years later, and Marceau converted in 2004. "Lori was very supportive of the [Haggadah] project. Although she was an anglophone from Toronto, she became fully bilingual, worked in French as a lawyer in Ottawa, and loved the duality of our home and the friends we invited around our table," he said.

Both editors emphasize that the project would not have been possible without the help of many people, be it with research, proofreading, donations or advice.

"From the outset, we only encountered excitement about this project," Rabbi Scheier said. "People really responded to the idea."

That input helped them find and select an eclectic mix of pictures, some familiar, but many rarely seen today.

Some examples are the first religious service held by a Jewish farming colony in Lipton, Sask., in 1906; Philip Adelberg, the first justice of the peace in British Columbia's Peace River district, taken in 1915; the Cornerbrook, Nfld., synagogue in the 1940s; the founding of Ecole Maïmonide in Montreal in the 1960s by the Sephardi community, the first French-language Jewish school in Montreal; and demonstrations for Soviet Jewry in the 1970s.

Marceau said he and Rabbi Scheier felt it was important to highlight the relationship between Canada and Israel over the years. There are shots of visiting Israeli leaders from David Ben-Gurion to Shimon Peres in 2012, as well as then-prime ministers Menachem Begin and Pierre Trudeau together in 1978.

The relationship is represented in the other direction as well, such as an Inuit delegation's visit to the Jewish state.

The Canadian Haggadah Canadienne, which weighs in at 168 pages, is tablet size in order to make it easy to use at the seder table. "It's not supposed to be a coffee table book," said Marceau.

It is being sold on Amazon.ca and at synagogues and Jewish bookstores for $20. Any proceeds will go to charity – split 50-50 between Rabbi Scheier's and Marceau's choices.

The book launch is on March 12 at the Shaar Hashomayim, with local launches in Toronto on March 18 and Ottawa on March 19. ■

National Assembly condemns hate crimes

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Quebec's National Assembly unanimously condemned what police are treating as a hate crime: Nazi graffiti and a death threat left at an apartment building in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce on Feb. 23.

An all-party motion was brought forward in the legislature Feb. 25 denouncing the crime, which saw the hoods of four vehicles parked in the interior garage of the building on Côte St. Luc Road at the corner of Hampton Avenue each spray painted with red swastikas.

Envelopes were found under the windshield wipers on some cars, with at least one containing a threatening note and a bullet. The windshield of one car was also smashed and a pickaxe left in front of it.

The motion condemned "the hateful acts perpetrated... against the Jewish population," and "denounced vigorously and without nuance any manifestation of intolerance based on ethnic origin or religious beliefs."

In passing the motion, Premier Philippe Couillard made an eloquent speech warning against intolerance in Quebec and for recognition of what the Jewish community has given to the province.

"[T]hese men, these women who live among us are not Jews living in Quebec, they are Québécois of the Jewish faith."

He concluded in English: "We can only denounce these acts of vandalism which reflect prejudice and intolerance. I wish to reassure the public that we will not tolerate that Quebecers are subject to threats because of their origins or their religious beliefs. These cowardly acts remind us of how important it is to continue to combat intolerant gestures that target the Jewish community and all ethnocultural minorities in Quebec."

Interim official opposition leader Stéphane Bédard, as well as Coalition Avenir Québec leader François Legault and Québec Solidaire leader Françoise David struck a similar theme in their statements.

Although it has not been confirmed who the damaged vehicles' owners are, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) views this crime as motivated by anti-Semitism.

"While the intent of the perpetrator cannot be absolutely determined at this time, given what is happening globally, the fact that swastikas are involved, that there were threatening notes and this is a Jewish area, leads one to understand that this was not just an act of simple vandalism but a crime targeting the Jewish community," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who chairs CIJA's security committee, after touring the site with police on Feb. 24.

After the National Assembly motion, CIJA Quebec chair Eric Maldoff said: "While the recent terrorist attacks on journalists and Jews in Europe are cause for concern for our community, we must not give in to fear because we know that we do not stand alone against the scourge of anti-Semitism.The Montreal police have made it a top priority to investigate [this] anti-Semitic vandalism... which they have boldly declared to be a hate crime and are making major efforts to ensure the security of our community."

He expressed appreciation for the provincial parliamentarians' firm stance, as well as that of Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre.

The mayor stated earlier: "I was staggered to see that such acts could be committed toward the Jewish community. Montreal is a welcoming city, where all religions must be able to live together harmoniously. Montrealers must denounce any such acts, whatever community is targeted. As for me, I say it loud and strong: not in my city!"

The crime was denounced by the Ottawa-based National Council of Canadian Muslims, which called it "a craven act" whose perpetrators should be prosecuted to the full extent of the law "to send a strong message against hate crimes and intolerance." It urged community leaders to report suspicious behaviour to authorities.

The vandalism was discovered after 10 p.m. on Feb. 23 when the smoke alarm sounded. There was no fire.

Rabbi Poupko said police are not releasing full details, but from what he understands the notes "said something to the effect that 'this bullet is for you.'"

Police had no suspects, and the garage has no surveillance cameras.

Rabbi Poupko said CIJA is satisfied the police are dedicating all the resources necessary to investigate this crime and appreciate that they have been questioning Jewish institutions in the area as to whether they noticed any suspicious activity of late.

A 15-year resident of the building, who withheld her name, told the media she'd never seen anything like this before in the building. Other residents said the garage's security had been an issue.

Police are asking anyone with information to call 514-393-1133. ■

Parenting Corner: put the little darlings to work

EIN LIGNER
VERY SPECIAL TO THE CJN

(The following article represents the views of the writer and not that of The CJN or any other normal human being.)

Kids. You can't live without them, you can't make them sleep in the garage. I know, because I've tried, and they don't like it.

It seems to me it wasn't that long ago that I, too, was a rebellious youngster with a mind of his own who didn't particularly like to hear what his parents had to say. Now, at the other end of the parenting spectrum, I don't particularly like what the kids have to say, all sass and brass and back talk.

Was I ever that big a brat?

Nah, never.

Well, maybe once. But those records are sealed, never to be seen again.

Parenting, it's been said, is the hardest thing you'll ever do, and whoever said that was right. But it's right only because of our precious #$@%&$ little children – whom we all love and cherish, by the way. Let me put that on the record right now.

So how does one get through the difficult years, the ones after they're toilet trained, but not yet living on their own.

Well, you can try to get the orthodontist to wire their mouths shut, but despite the most persuasive arguments and the offer of a free car wash for a year, that hasn't worked yet.

Or you can try to find them a job. That would get them out of the house for a time, and when they got back, they'd probably be too tired for their normal stress-inducing behaviours. Hey, it's more cost effective than registering them for expensive extra-curricular activities, but there are those damned child-friendly labour laws to consider.

And pampered as they are, they'd probably ask for a ride to work.

When I was a youngster, even at age nine, my friends and I would take the bus downtown and were away the entire day without parental supervision. If our kids did that today, we'd probably have children's services on our tails, ready to put us in jail for neglect.

Come to think of it, our parents' entire generation could have been investigated and ended up with lengthy stays in the crowbar hotel. In fact, all the parental generations throughout history would have criminal records if they were around today.

OK, so a parent needs something that will keep the kids busy and be legal at the same time. How about a job as doorman at an exotic dancer peeler bar?

It is a bit of a grey area, admittedly. But it would take place after school, so those damned intrusive truancy people would be kept at bay.

The shift at the afternoon jamboree might work, but not the evening one. If we get them there right after school and child labour codes are respected, the delightful, hard-working little tykes – did I mention how much we cherish them? – could put in a good day's work and be back home in time for milk and cookies.

Update: my wife – she who must be obeyed – has kinda' nixed the peeler bar idea. I guess all that's left is to put them in front of the computer and turn them into Minecraft zombies, for whom the world begins and ends at a computer screen.

A lot of parents are doing that right now. It's a social, bonding, keep-them-in-the-loop kind of thing, don't you know. I guess we're going to climb aboard that parenting bandwagon.

There's another one-one vote that I lost.

Still, I like the make-'em-work approach. They can take up the computer when they're older and wiser – well, at least when they're older. Except then, they might have kids of their own and... That's it. Let them get a taste of their own medicine with their own kids, the little darlings.

What comes around, goes around. It will be poetic justice.

In the meantime, I'm going to take a nap – in the garage. ■

Canadian woman says she can't leave Israel

Parents given temporary custody of her two sons after obtaining a 'no exit' order against her

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, JERUSALEM

Pregnant single mom Hana Gan is trying to get her kids back and return to Canada after being barred from leaving Israel last month and seeing authorities give temporary custody of her two sons to her parents.

According to her supporters, she sought to leave because her parents wanted her to be more religiously observant, while her parents contend she can't care for her kids because she isn't responsible with money.

Gan, who has been advised by her supporters not to speak with the media, moved to Israel last December seeking a better life for her children, but almost immediately realized it was a mistake. Living with her parents at the time, she decided to return to Canada.

Earlier in February, according to spokesperson Moti Leybel of the Israeli organization Bereaved Parents with Living Children, Gan filed complaints with Israeli police alleging that her father was beating her. Then, saying her father had destroyed the children's Canadian passports, she reached out for help to Leybel's organization.

Leybel said situations such as Gan's are common in Israel and that his organization represents "hundreds and hundreds of parents" whose children have been removed without cause by social services.

Leybel took Gan to the airport on Feb. 19, after she had obtained emergency passports for her children. He waited outside in case there was trouble. "I got this phone call, and she was crying, screaming and shouting. They tried to get her kids away. She told me, 'I'm holding them tight, I don't want them to take them.'"

She wasn't allowed to leave Israel because her parents had obtained a "no exit" order against her. She managed to leave the airport, and Leybel took her and her sons, ages 5 and 6-1/2, to a friend's apartment. However, on Feb. 22, police tracked them down.

Leybel said the police reaction was disproportionate. "They acted like she was a serial killer. At one point, there were 15 cops in the apartment, in the stairway."

When police took Gan in for questioning, social workers handed her children over to her parents, Eli and Drora Gan, with whom they were to remain while awaiting a March 3 custody hearing.

Leybel said that with an emergency warrant, children can be removed from their parents' home for up to seven days without a judge's signature.

The social services department of the Mateh Yehudah Regional Council in Gan's parents' city of Beit Shemesh released a short statement reading, in part: "This is a complex matter which is now being held behind closed doors in court... we hope, of course, for a speedy resolution for the benefit of all those involved."

According to her lawyer, Benny Dekel, Gan decided to leave Israel when her parents demanded "that she lead a life the way they see it, as frum Jews... She felt a little bit stressed and uncomfortable, so she decided to leave."

Dekel said the parents obtained a "no exit" order with almost no documentation. "Whenever there's even a small, minimal risk to kids, the courts give this order right away." He said he's working on cancelling the no exit order as well as restoring her guardianship of the children.

Gan's mother, Drora, told The CJN the children would be in danger if they left Israel.

She said she and and her husband have tried for years to help Gan live independently with her children and only stepped in now because they saw no choice. "She has gambling and money problems. She used to spend all the rent money. There were always problems."

Gan lived with them for four years in Canada, where they had returned for business reasons just after Gan's divorce, Drora said, and she depended on them financially, despite receiving social assistance.

In a blog post from 2013, Gan admitted, "I don't know if I'm ready to quit the gamble [sic], or stop shopping." In that post, she called the timing of her parents' return to Toronto just after her divorce "miraculous."

Although Gan was born in Israel, she qualified as a new immigrant and received financial aid on arrival. Drora said Gan spent the money shopping, leaving her penniless again.

"As soon as she arrives in Canada, the children would be on the street. She has no house, no driving license. She lost it when she didn't pay her parking tickets. She doesn't have any credit cards because of all her credit problems. She couldn't rent a place because nobody would rent to her."

Gan's supporters sent The CJN letters from three Toronto families offering her a home. One, Rebecca Sorokin, met Gan and her children in 2014. She said she's disgusted with any system that separates mothers from children without due process. "I am half-Israeli, but I'm... [also] a social worker, and I'm a mom. We shouldn't support [Israel] no matter what, if there's flaws in the system.

"This is just a loving mom, trying to cope and take care of her kids. She just wants to get back home where she felt safe."

Drora rejected allegations that Gan isn't safe in Israel or that her father, Eli, abused Gan during her current pregnancy.

"People think my husband beat her in the tummy, put her on the floor. What is he, an SS man? She can make up stories," Drora said. "You should see how her children love my husband, their grandfather. They tell him, 'Saba, you are the best in the world.'"

She also says Gan's non-Jewish ex-husband in Canada has sent a letter supporting their custody claim, saying he wants his children raised as Jews.

Though she and her husband Eli are religious, Drora insisted, "We never fought over religion... We never fought with her to come here [to Israel]. She wanted to come, she said, 'My children will have a better life.'"

Attempts to reach the Canadian Embassy for comment on the case were unsuccessful. ■

Schabas keeps demonizing Israel, despite ethics violations

Gerald Steinberg

When Canadian law professor William Schabas was exposed as having omitted a blatant conflict of interest in applying for a UN position, he abruptly resigned as head of the latest commission investigating Israeli "war crimes." However, he did not slink away quietly in embarrassment, or apologize and ask for forgiveness.

Instead, as a political warrior, his strategy has been to counterattack and spin the discussion in a way that his image is changed from attacker to victim. Schabas is an intense ideologue, dedicated to radical causes in which hostility toward Israel is at the top of the agenda. For many years, he has used his status as a professor of international law to advance this form of warfare, including serving as a PLO adviser. (This was the "minor point" he omitted in a UN application form.) His appointment as head of a high-profile UN investigation was a major achievement, and his removal a greater defeat.

To divert attention from his ethical violations, Schabas' primary response is to dress himself in the clothes of the victim of an Israeli-led conspiracy. In a sympathetic article published in the New York Times, he complained of being targeted in "a stream of vulgar and violent emails and several death threats."

Schabas has also tried to use his Canadian link to present his spin. In an interview last month with The CJN, he made the Pinocchio-like claim that there was "no evidence I'm biased against Israel." But the article provided plenty of evidence. For example, the interviewer (reporter Paul Lungen) asked about a 2011 public declaration that Netanyahu "should be in the dock of an international court." Schabas awkwardly sidestepped the specifics, instead presenting a convoluted attempt to redefine bias.

Similarly, a New York Times interview was headlined to reflect his spin: "Former Head of Inquiry Into Gaza War Says He Faced Pressure and Threats." Again avoiding any recognition of his own ethical violations, Schabas claimed to be the victim of a vast Israeli conspiracy. Schabas then shamelessly exploited his partial Jewish background and the Holocaust, referring to himself as "a descendant of eastern European Jews on his father's side, some of whom had died in the Holocaust, and that he was proud of his Jewish heritage." This statement contrasts sharply with Schabas' policy of otherwise omitting any such references. (In 2004, when Ken Roth, the powerful head of Human Rights Watch, was criticized for crusading against Israel, he also pulled out his Jewish roots and his father's experience in Germany in the 1930s.)

The most revealing counterattack was made in close co-operation with Richard Falk, a leading anti-Israel warrior and official in the UN Human Rights Council until recently. (Full disclosure: I have debated and exposed Falk for many years, including his own abuse of the term "as a Jew," and he recently denounced me as a "hasbarah specialist," among other labels.) In fact, it was in his application to replace Falk at the UNHRC that Schabas lied about his conflicts of interest. With Falk's encouragement, Schabas makes the absurd accusation that the "charges of bias against me were nothing more than a witch-hunt, something reminiscent of McCarthyism."

Schabas would do well to take a lesson from Judge Richard Goldstone, who preceded him as the UN's chief accuser versus Israel. Goldstone did not lie on applications or hide conflicts of interest. His failure was due to naiveté and the ease with which the anti-Israel NGO network exploited his Jewish connections for promoting false accusations and modern blood libels. But to Goldstone's credit, when he belatedly realized this, he renounced the report and has kept silent on these issues ever since. Schabas is far from naïve, but having been caught in the act, he would be well advised to keep quiet and begin to atone for his sins – as a "descendant of Jews," he has seven months until Yom Kippur. ■

White House plugs Obama's pro-Israeli stance

REBECCA SHIMONI STOIL
WASHINGTON

As Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu landed in the United States, and thousands of pro-Israel activists in town readied to go to bat for greater congressional oversight on any Iran deal, the White House went on the attack, publishing a blog post plugging President Barack Obama's positive record on the Jewish State.

A blog post titled "five key facts you need to know about the U.S.-Israel relationship under President [Barack] Obama" sent around by the White House Sunday evening touted Obama's credentials as a supporter of Israel, and also emphasized that the United States has had a long history of support for Israel.

The post comes after a week of intense back-and-forth between Israel and Washington over Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's planned March 3 speech before both houses of Congress, and as the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's annual policy conference got under way.

"Under President Obama's leadership, American engagement with Israel has grown and strengthened to an unprecedented degree," the fact sheet read. "From meeting frequently with Israeli leaders to ensuring that Israel remains the largest recipient of U.S. foreign assistance, the president is deeply committed to helping Israel maintain its strength and security."

The blog post highlighted that "the first country to recognize Israel, the United States, has forged a deep and unshakable bond with Israel through a multifaceted relationship that reflects the depth and breadth of the ties between our people and the values that we share."

Last month, a Netanyahu campaign commercial compared the current prime minister to founding father David Ben-Gurion, noting that then-U.S. secretary of state George Marshall opposed the creation of the State of Israel.

Describing Obama as "a strong defender," the post noted that "President Obama has strengthened Israel's defence in concrete and unprecedented ways." It cited numerous budgetary benefits that Israel has received since 2009 as evidence, as well as the continued regularly scheduled joint military exercises between the nations' armies.

It went on to emphasize Obama's role in "leading global efforts to defend Israel's legitimacy on the world stage," as well as describing him as an "economic partner."

While many of the bullet points emphasized policies that were carried out through the administration and legislative initiatives, the blog highlighted Obama's personal role as "a proponent of peace."

"The president has strongly supported Israel in its quest for peace with its neighbours," the fact sheet read, emphasizing that "President Obama has repeatedly stood up for a two-state solution that ensures the peace and security of Israelis and Palestinians."

It also ascribed a high level of presidential involvement in the failed attempts to broker a comprehensive peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority that ultimately collapsed last spring.

"Under the president's direction, Secretary [John] Kerry initiated an intensive, collaborative effort to facilitate negotiations for a comprehensive peace agreement between Israelis and Palestinians," the blog asserted. "The president prioritized Israel's security by asking one of our foremost military experts to help develop security arrangements that ensure a two-state solution leaves Israelis more secure, not less."

The fifth point of the blog noted that "under President Obama, the U.S. has invested millions in helping Israeli immigrants." It continued that "in the last six years, U.S. humanitarian assistance to refugees and migrants travelling to Israel totalled $140 million."

The funds, the blog said, are "used to help transport eligible migrants to Israel, [and for] transitional shelter, intensive Hebrew-language programs that focus on newly arriving immigrants, or youth programming in Israel."

The blog concluded with a curt instruction to "share this information with everyone who needs to know." ■

U.S. groups slam Boteach ad

JTA
WASHINGTON

An array of American Jewish groups condemned an ad by a foundation associated with Rabbi Shmuley Boteach accusing U.S. National Security Adviser Susan Rice of turning a blind eye to genocide.

"Susan Rice has a blind spot: Genocide," said the advertisement appearing in the Feb. 28 New York Times, touting a talk on Iran this week in Washington hosted by Rabbi Boteach, the New Jersey-based author and pro-Israel advocate.

As soon as the Sabbath ended, Jewish groups rushed to condemn the ad by This World: The Values Network.

The American Jewish Committee called it "revolting," the Anti-Defamation League called it "spurious and perverse," the Jewish Federations of North America called it "outrageous" and Josh Block, the president of the Israel Project, said it was "entirely inappropriate."

Marshall Wittmann, spokesperson for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, which was to host Rice on at its annual conference this week, said, "Ad hominem attacks should have no place in our discourse."

On March 1, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations issued a statement blasting the ad.

Other condemnations came from the Orthodox Union, J Street, the Jewish Council for Public Affairs, the National Council of Jewish Women and the Rabbinical Assembly of the Conservative movement. In a combined statement, the leaders of the Union for Reform Judaism and Reform's Religious Action Center called the ad "grotesque," "abhorrent" and a "sinister slur."

The ad notes Rice's recent complaints about Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's address to Congress on March 3, which was organized without consulting the White House. Netanyahu was to speak against the nuclear talks between Iran and the major powers, which U.S. President Barack Obama backs. Rice said last week that the way the speech was organized was "destructive" to the U.S.-Israel relationship.

The ad also notes a controversy from the 1990s, when Rice was on president Bill Clinton's National Security Council staff and reportedly advised against describing the mass killings in Rwanda as "genocide."

"Ms. Rice may be blind to the issue of genocide, but should treat our ally with at least as much diplomatic courtesy as she does the committed enemy of both our nations," it said.

In an interview, Rabbi Julie Schonfeld, who directs the Rabbinical Assembly, said Rice deserved an apology from Rabbi Boteach. The ad "is completely inconsistent with the record of friendship and loyalty this public official has shown Israel and the Jewish People," Rabbi Schonfeld said.

Rice grew close to pro-Israel and Jewish groups during her stint as U.S. envoy to the United Nations, in Obama's first term.

"It is not up to Shmuley Boteach to make it appear this is the way the Jewish community treats our friends," Rabbi Schonfeld said.

Rabbi Boteach in an interview said he stood behind the ad. "The stakes could not be higher, and our ad rightly points out that Susan Rice has gone beyond any mandate in condemning the prime minister for simply speaking out," he said. "Condemnation should be directed not at those who seek to give Israel a voice, but to those who seek to deny it."

Rabbi Boteach, whose talk on March 1 was to take place in a Senate office building and was to include Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust memoirist, as well as Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Calif.) and Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), appealed to AIPAC activists to attend.

Sherman condemned the ad on Twitter, but did not say if he was still intending to take part in the event it was promoting. "This ad is outrageous and harms the U.S.-Israel alliance," he said. "It should be denounced in every forum."

AIPAC, like many of the groups that condemned the ad, is skeptical of the Iran nuclear talks.

Nathan Diament, the Washington director of the Orthodox Union, a group that has been very skeptical of the talks, on Twitter described the ad as an "inappropriate ad hominem attack" that "doesn't advance discourse on key issue of Iran."

Rabbi Steve Gutow, who heads the JCPA, the public policy umbrella for the Jewish community, said the ad was a blow against bipartisan support for Israel. "It's a sad moment for the Jewish community to have this ad appear," he said in an interview. ■

Murder risks plunging Russia into civil war

JTA
NEW YORK

The murder of former deputy prime minister Boris Nemtsov risks plunging Russia into civil war, Russian dissident Mikhail Khodorkovsky said.

An unidentified shooter gunned down Nemtsov on March 28, a leading opposition politician in Russia. Nemtsov was a Christian, but had a Jewish mother.

Khodorkovsky, a Russian Jew who left for Switzerland in 2013, made the warning in a statement posted on his website. The dissident, who was sentenced to 11 years in prison following graft trials that critics alleged were designed to eliminate his political ambitions and criticisms of human rights abuses by Russian President Vladimir Putin, noted that Nemtsov was murdered "100 metres from the Kremlin."

"I know that for many people, Boris' death will become so much of a Rubicon that the entire country may become different," Khodorkovsky wrote on his website. "Will we find ourselves standing even closer to the precipice of all-out war of everybody against everybody? Or will we find within ourselves the strength to understand that political differences are not a reason to stop acting like human beings?"

An unidentified attacker in a car shot Nemtsov four times in the back as he crossed a bridge in view of the Kremlin, police said. Putin condemned the murder and said he has was closely monitoring the investigation amid widespread speculation that Nemtsov was eliminated by the Kremlin, as were other dissidents before him.

Leonid Bershidsky, a Russian Jewish journalist, in an opinion piece published on bloombergview.com, wrote that the death validated Nemtsov's criticism of Putin "in the most terrible way."

Bershidsky also criticized Putin's government for what he said amounted to incitement against Nemtsov, writing that Nemtsov's name was "on every list of traitors published on the Internet and aired on state TV."

"It did not help that he was Jewish," he wrote. "There was a strong undercurrent of anti-Semitism in the smear campaign." ■

Nimoy rediscovered his Jewish roots in early 1990s

JTA

Leonard Nimoy's Spock has proven to be one of the most famous television characters of the 20th century. Nimoy said that he based the character's split-finger salute, now a pop culture fixture, on a Kohanic blessing that involves a manual approximation of the Hebrew letter shin.

Nimoy died at his home in Los Angeles on Feb. 27 of chronic pulmonary disease. He was 83.

Nimoy was born in Boston's West End neighbourhood in 1931 to Yiddish-speaking, Orthodox Jewish immigrant parents from then Soviet Ukraine.

Nimoy rediscovered his Jewish roots. In 1991, he produced and starred in Never Forget, a TV movie based on the story of a Holocaust survivor who sues a group of neo-Nazi Holocaust deniers, and four years later he hosted an NPR series in which Jewish celebrities read aloud Jewish short stories.

In 2002, he published Shekhina, a book of photographs of semi-nude Jewish women, which angered Orthodox leaders. And in 2009, he narrated a documentary about the Beth Sholom Synagogue in Elkins Park, Pa., which was designed by Frank Lloyd Wright.

After teaching method acting in his own studio and making several minor film and television appearances in the 1950s and early 1960s, Nimoy was cast in the original Star Trek TV series as Spock, a pragmatic alien with trademark pointed ears, in 1965. Star Trek became a cult classic show in the 1970s and eventually spawned five subsequent TV series and 12 films.

Nimoy played Spock for more than four decades and sustained a successful Broadway theatre career. His other notable acting roles include Paris in the spy series Mission Impossible and the psychiatrist David Kibner in a 1978 remake of Invasion of the Body Snatchers.

Nimoy showcased his ambivalence about being closely identified with the Spock role through the titles of his two autobiographies, which are titled I Am Not Spock and I Am Spock. ■

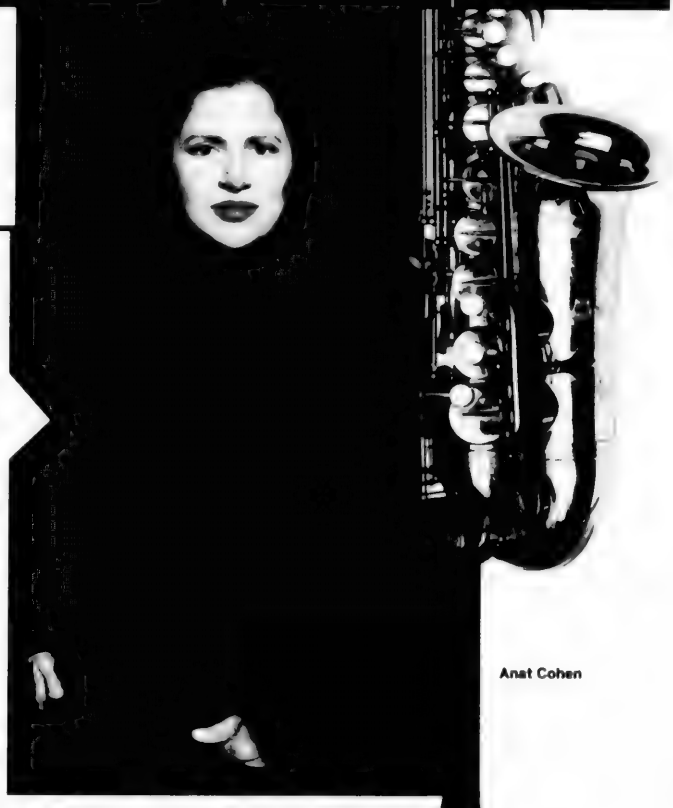
Concert showcases Israeli jazz musicians



Anat Cohen

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

For the past two decades, the Holy Land has produced a bounty of outstanding jazz musicians who pulled up their roots and replanted themselves in the New World, especially in New York, where a strong Israeli contingent thrives.

Notable jazz musicians of Israeli origin will be showcased at the Rex Jazz and Blues Bar in Toronto on March 18. Two New York-based artists, clarinet and saxophone player Anat Cohen and pianist Guy Mintus, with their bands, are featured on a bill along with Toronto bassist Kobi Hass. A former Tel Aviv resident, Hass will be leading a quartet of local musicians.

The evening's headliner is Cohen, an internationally acclaimed artist who has topped critics and readers polls in the clarinet category in DownBeat magazine every year since 2011.

Cohen, 39, said when she began studying clarinet at the age of 12 while attending the Jaffa conservatory, she never imagined that "she would become a professional musician and that the clarinet would take her around the world." She added that at the time, the clarinet "was out of fashion" because it was associated with old-style swing and folk music.

At 16, Cohen joined the conservatory's big band and learned to play saxophone, out of necessity. "There was no clarinet chair in the big band, so the conductor said, 'Why don't you go to the storage room and pick up a tenor sax,'" she said. DownBeat has named Cohen a rising star in the soprano and tenor saxophone categories several times.

Cohen has two brothers who are also accomplished jazz musicians – the trumpeter, Avishai, and the saxophonist, Yuval. She records with her brothers under the band name 3 Cohens.

She said playing with her brothers is amazing because they know one another well and meshing musically comes naturally. "It takes years to develop this kind of intimacy with musicians," she said.

In 1996, Cohen left Israel to study at Berklee College of Music in Boston, where she was introduced to New Orleans-style jazz, African grooves and Brazilian music by her classmates, styles she learned by immersing herself in the music. At the Rex with her quartet, Cohen will play selections from her latest recording Luminosa, which features several Brazilian numbers and original material.

Opening the Rex's jazz showcase is upright and electric bass player Kobi Hass. He's worked in bands that have backed up some well-known Israeli pop rock singers, among them Leah Shabat, Gali Atarai, Bridget Habib and Riki Gal. Hass picked up his first electric bass by chance, while he was studying choir conducting at Tel Aviv University.

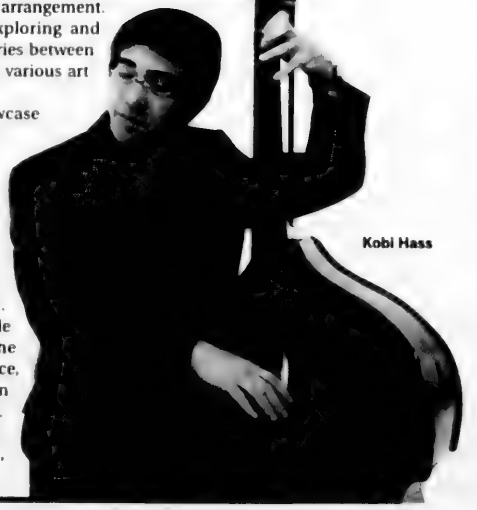
"I ran into someone who wanted to sell a bass," he said. "I realized I could make a good living playing the bass." He was already an established bass player when he spent four years studying jazz at Berklee College of Music.

Hass, 59, who moved to Toronto with his family in 2010, has been playing at the city's clubs, backing up singers, subbing for the bassist in the group Jaffa Road and getting into jazz seriously.

He said that he and three other local musicians, pianist Barry Livingstone, drummer Paul Fitterer and Ernie Tollar on saxophone and flute, have been meeting at his house to play jazz just for fun. "Slowly we got our own sound," Hass said.

At the Rex, the quartet, with Hass on upright bass, will perform some of his original compositions, as well as Livingstone's.

To round out the program at the Rex, pianist Guy Mintus, 23, leads a trio of America-Israel Cultural Foundation scholarship winners. Mintus is a recipient of the Herb Alpert Young Jazz Composer Award by ASCAP (American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers) and of two DownBeat student awards for outstanding jazz performance and arrangement. He is dedicated to exploring and stretching the boundaries between musical traditions and various art disciplines.



Kobi Hass

The Israeli Jazz Showcase is presented by the Toronto Jazz Festival and the Israel Consulate General, Toronto and Western Canada, and is part of the Spotlight on Israeli Culture showcase (www.spotlightonisraeliculture.ca). Tickets are available at the Rex only on the night of the performance, March 18. Admission is $20. Cash sales only. Showtime is 6:30 p.m. For more information, call 416-598-2475. ■

Female comics address stigma with period podcast

When Natalie Norman, 28, first started doing stand-up four years ago, another female comedian gave her what was meant to be well-intentioned advice: don't talk about your period on stage.

Norman, a Toronto native and veteran of the Young Judaea summer camp system, said she found the remark "extremely offensive."

Soon after, she befriended Jess Beaulieu, another female comic, also 28, who Norman said she knew to be "a very political, opinionated, feminist woman."

They got to talking about the constraints of operating in what many female comics hold is a "man's game" and the pervasive myth that female comedians only make jokes about their periods.

"It's this ongoing theory held by dudes [in the comedy scene]," Beaulieu said, one that causes many female comedians to avoid the subject outright, fearful of fueling the stereotype.

"It isn't true at all," she noted, "but if it were, there would be no problem with that... Women being told we aren't permitted to touch certain subjects, especially in relation to our bodies, so as not to offend men. That's oppression."

She stressed that the falsehood stems from "a place of disgust toward the female anatomy," adding, "Not all women menstruate, but a lot do, and it's a pretty big life experience."

In 2013, Norman decided to address the stigma head on.

"I was like, fuck this, I'm going to do a comedy show that's all about periods," she said.

She teamed up with another comic to produce a live show featuring female comedians sharing jokes and stories about their periods.

Called Stories from the Red Tent, its stated purpose was to defy the cultural silence surrounding menstruation.

"People really seemed to connect with the jokes," Beaulieu, who performed in it, said.

Emboldened by the positive reception, Norman and Beaulieu decided to develop a weekly podcast devoted exclusively to the subject of menstruation.

And so, The Crimson Wave, a 45-minute podcast, available on iTunes, was born.

Running for a little more than a year now, each episode features Beaulieu and Norman interviewing a guest, generally another female comedian, about her experience of menstruation.

They ask about things like first periods, familial advice, regularity and consistency of flow, birth control, whether the guest uses tampons, pads or a menstrual cup, cramps, pre-menstrual syndrome, childbirth and whether the guest engages in sexual activity during her period.

They often veer into broader discussions of feminism, female sexuality, health care access, mental health and women's experiences of their bodies within a patriarchal society.

Norman and Beaulieu are frank and funny, bantering and laughing easily with their guests, but they're also highly compassionate.

"Guests often tell us stories they've never told anyone else," Norman said.

In one episode, a comedian recounts the trauma of getting her first period in a school classroom. Another talks about the discomfort of getting her period four years after her twin sister, and another recalls contending with menstruation as an adolescent in an all-male household.

Guests frequently express how liberating – cathartic, even – it is to discuss something so culturally suppressed. Some have gone on to write period jokes into their comedy acts.

Feedback for The Crimson Wave has been largely positive, the women say, but last fall, they entered a CBC competition called Comedy Coup, to develop a television pilot (they made it to the second round), and a video they posted online, featuring them discussing ways to use menstrual blood around the house, garnered criticism.

"People called us gross, said they wanted to throw up," Norman said. "I think it's strange that when it's menstrual blood, people are grossed out, but if it's a body being chopped up and dragged across the screen, like in so many movies, everyone's fine with that."

Beaulieu emphasized the double-edged sword of publicly addressing menstruation, both within comedy and generally. When a woman acknowledges her period, she said, she's regarded by patriarchal society as weak or hyper-emotional, while pretending it doesn't exist reinforces the notion it's shameful.

"It's ridiculous that women are looked upon as weak for feeling the effects of something biological, which has existed since the dawn of time," she said.

Norman and Beaulieu are determined to continue challenging the menstruation taboo, and say they've begun to see some change.

"I think women in general, and specifically comedians, are becoming more comfortable sharing stories about their bodies and expressing opinions in relation to menstruation," Beaulieu said. "We are pushing back against the patriarchy, and I couldn't be happier." ■

Acclaimed songwriter talks about growing up with dyslexia

RUTH SCHWEITZER

Marc Jordan at the piano. KATHERINE HOLLAND PHOTO

Songwriter Marc Jordan, who has penned songs for Rod Stewart, Joe Cocker, Diana Ross, Cher and Josh Groban, had a childhood secret that was a source of shame and pain for him when he was growing up and into adulthood.

A bright kid, he had trouble reading and writing and didn't know why. Jordan, now 67, was in the school system before awareness of dyslexia was widespread. It's an inherited condition that makes it difficult to recognize and comprehend written words.

"I didn't know what it was. Nobody knew," he said on the phone from Los Angeles, where he was writing songs for Stewart's new album.

Jordan said he was frustrated in school and grew to dislike it. "I always sat at the back of the class and never put my hand up. My teachers got the message I didn't want to work."

He spent hours doing homework and still failed his tests. Luckily, his parents believed in him. "They knew I was smart," Jordan said.

He was acting out and getting into trouble in his last couple of years at Jarvis Collegiate in Toronto, when his parents sent him to the Hincks Institute, a children's mental health centre, for testing.

"They gave me a number of tests where I scored high when they were conceptual and visual," Jordan said. "Then I knew something was wrong with how I was processing information."

In the end, though, Jordan said his dyslexia was a kind of blessing. Raised in a musical family – his father was the singer Charles Jordan, a part-time cantor at Holy Blossom Temple – he was enrolled for piano lessons. The lessons were a struggle for him because when he tried to read music, the notes swam around on the page in front of him. But he figured out how to do his homework, to learn a piece for the next lesson, without reading music.

"I had a trick," Jordan recalled. He explained that he would ask his teacher to play the piece at the end of the lesson. "I would run home and try to remember it. So I developed a good ear for music."

Inspired by Bob Dylan and music he heard on the radio – "that was my school," Jordan said – he gravitated to popular music, where playing by ear is commonplace.

Jordan's dyslexia remained undiagnosed for many years, though, until about 15 years ago. Tests given to his daughter, Zoe, then eight or nine years old, determined that she had dyslexia. And then Jordan realized he had it, too.

"Kids with dyslexia learn in a different way and have to be allowed to learn in a different way," he said.

Jordan wants to help young people with dyslexia learn, and is looking to partner with an organization. He now takes the view that dyslexia isn't a learning disability, but rather a "different way of processing information. It's not a deficit or handicap," he said. In fact, people with dyslexia, like Jordan, are often creative, perhaps because of the unique way they process information, thinking mainly in pictures instead of in words.

Jordan, who is based in Toronto, has released 14 albums of his own, many of them critically acclaimed, and he's written 200 songs for a long list of singers, including international and Canadian stars. His songs have been featured on some 35 million records.

Jordan said that lately people have been asking him to perform songs from his archive. Why hasn't he done it before? "It never came to me," he said modestly.

So he decided to embark on his Narcissist's Guide to Songwriting Tour 2015-16. His sets will include Rhythm of My Heart, a No. 1 hit for Stewart; Soul on Soul, recorded by Stewart and Jordan's wife, Amy Sky; Pieces of Ice, which was first covered by Diana Ross; Fall From Grace, a big hit for Amanda Marshall, and Marina Del Rey, one of Jordan's most popular songs. He'll be sharing stories about some of the artists he's worked with, too. ■

Jordan's tour stops at the Aeolian Hall, in London, Ont., on March 12; LIVEact Theatre, in Whitby, Ont., March 13; The Neat, Burnstown (near Ottawa), March 14, and the Jazz Bistro, Toronto, March 27 and 28. He'll be backed by Dave Restivo on piano, Mark Lalama on keyboards, Russ Boswell on bass and Kevan McKenzie on drums. For more information, visit www.marcjordan.com.

Shining a clearer light on Herzl

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Some historians provide such sharp perspective and clear insight, the reader feels as if he has seen the world from a high mountain through haze-free light and cloudless sky. Ideas and new notions fill the foreground. Crisp details come alive despite the distance of time. Such is the skill of Shlomo Avineri of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. And such is the feeling he imparts to his readers in Herzl's Vision (BlueBridge 2014).

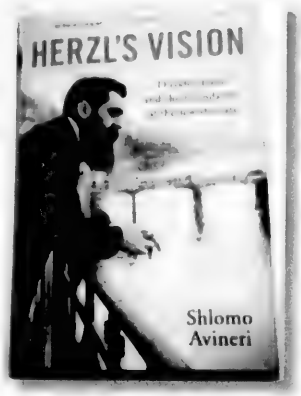
Theodor Herzl is perhaps the pre-eminent, iconic figure of modern, political Zionism. The story of his life has been well chronicled. And yet, Avineri has found a new way to deepen our understanding of modern Zionism's most famous advocate.

In Herzl's Vision, Avineri writes about the evolution of Herzl's thinking, primarily during the nine-year period when the young, Vienna-based journalist stepped emphatically, seemingly from nowhere, onto centre stage of world diplomacy. How did he get there? Avineri tells us.

The aim of his book, Avineri writes, is to "transform the canonical image of the larger-than-life person into a real, living human being." The book "tries to focus mainly on Herzl's intellectual and spiritual odyssey and to bring out his own doubts, false starts and wrong turns as well as his evident achievements. It is this route that turned Herzl from a private and marginal individual into a Jewish political leader and transformed Zionism from an esoteric, if not cranky idea, into a player on the international scene. For Herzl, this was also a process of self-discovery and self-education."

Avineri's vast experience as a historian, teacher, political scientist and high-level public servant are in full evidence throughout the work. He has mined the rich vein of some 1,500 pages of Herzl's hand-written diary, along with Herzl's published works, to uncover new insights about the man.

Writing deftly and concisely, Avineri dives into the deep end of Herzl's churning mind and stirring Jewish heart. Herzl was appalled at the level of violence of parliamentary life in France, at the racially based theories of anti-Semitism being passed off as science in enlightened Austria and Hungary, at the ubiquitous scapegoating of the Jew throughout Europe and of the sheer physical peril faced by many Jews of eastern Europe at the turn of the last century.



Herzl's Vision: Theodor Herzl and the Foundation of the Jewish State
Shlomo Avineri, translated by Haim Watzman
BlueBridge (2014)

The plight of the Jews of Europe worried Herzl constantly. He describes this worry in his diary: "As the years went on, the question bored into me and gnawed at me, tormented me... In fact, I kept coming back to it whenever my own personal experience – joys and sorrows – permitted me to rise to broader considerations... The Jewish question naturally lurked for me around every turn and corner."

It was not – as is commonly thought – the trial of Alfred Dreyfus that crystallized for Herzl the driving obsession to safeguard the Jewish People. Rather, as Avineri points out, it was "Herzl's long analysis of the failure of emancipation and the rise of German and Austrian anti-Semitism, that led him to his radical conclusions."

Avineri goes into great detail explaining Herzl's two seminal works, The Jewish State, published in 1895, and Altneuland, in 1902. These works had a profoundly transformative impact upon the Jewish world. Avineri excerpts liberally from both works, provides a full précis of their key messages, and discusses their substantive and literary failings and strengths. More importantly, he assesses the works based upon their reach into a far-off, still imaginary Jewish future.

It was especially the appearance of The Jewish State that galvanized hopes among Jews in eastern and western Europe and in North Africa. A new sovereign era for Jews, they believed, was dawning over the next horizon.

Avineri painstakingly describes Herzl's exhausting activism on behalf of the establishment of a Jewish state. He founded the World Zionist Organization, convened the famous annual conferences, lobbied Jewish philanthropists, met with industrialists and businessmen, and petitioned European government officials, heads of state, emperors and even the Pope.

He represented no government, and yet every leader with whom he met, treated him as the spokesperson for the Jewish People. By virtue of the tirelessness and unwavering focus of his effort, Herzl became a "world-historical figure." Singlehandedly, he placed the Zionist cause on the agenda of European diplomatic discourse.

According to Avineri, Herzl never lost hope in his cause, despite the many setbacks. For example, after a discouraging session with Baron de Hirsch of Paris, "another, more realistic man would have given up. Another man, less determined, might have despaired. But Herzl responded differently." After the disastrous decision to place the Uganda option on the agenda of the Sixth Zionist Conference in 1903, the resultant rift with the delegates from Russia and the meek attempts to patch up their differences, Herzl "did not give up. He set out in January 1904 for a meeting in Rome with the king of Italy. During this trip, he also obtained an unplanned audience with the Pope."

But Herzl's remorselessly gruelling schedule took its toll. He died on July 3, 1904, at the age of 44. Tens of thousands attended his funeral in Vienna. Tens of thousands more mourned him throughout the Jewish world.

Early on in his campaign for a Jewish homeland, Herzl described his hope of a national home for the Jewish People as a "work of infinite grandeur." Indeed it was. Indeed it still is.

Though the world is reluctant to admit this fact, we can see its truth in the full light of the more than 100 years that have elapsed since the publication of The Jewish State in 1895.

To be sure, the State of Israel, as Herzl had foreseen, is flawed and imperfect. It strives to be better, but its attention and resources have been diverted from the very first moment of its national life.

But, like Theodor Herzl, the people of Israel do not give up. They have not yet lost their hope that they will succeed in securing and improving their country for the sake of all its inhabitants. ■

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Natural foods chef Carolyn Cohen and certified holistic nutritionist Krissy Smith are among Toronto's busiest experts in the culinary world.

Cohen has owned and operated Delicious Dish Cooking School for the past 14 years. Smith has over half a decade of experience working with Dr. Joey Shulman of the Shulman Clinic and in her own practice, Eat, Play, Live Nutrition.

Both women have brought their long-standing passion for health, wellness and tasty food together and created a new venture: Delicious Nutrition, a holistic nutrition cooking school.

"Food should energize and enhance your life. We are all about helping you find that balance. Our mission is to educate and help you learn the how-why-when-and-what to eat, to keep you healthy for life," said Smith.

"Life is changing. We need to focus on cooking differently, and the best way to do that is to offer our clients healthy recipes and holistically based nutrition geared for the entire family," said Cohen.

Delicious Nutrition offers seasonal programs for people who want to improve their health without sacrificing tasty food in the process.

Recently, students came out to Delicious Nutrition's two-day Eating Clean Workshop held at Nella Cucina Kitchen Studio.

Participants learned about nutritionally sound, balanced and easy-to-follow meal planning, experienced live cooking demos, and were given tips and tastings.

"People [went] home armed with the better part of 50 recipes on which they can live," said Cohen.

Delicious Nutrition provided this recipe that was featured in the Eating Clean Workshop.

Muffin Tin Frittata

Why your body will love this: the complete protein found in eggs combined with detoxifying cauliflower and fibre-rich navy beans makes this a super filling meal. Basil, chives and parsley offer green vitamin goodness and tons of flavour.

- ❑ 8 oz. or 2 cups of cauliflower florets
- ❑ 1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1 onion, sliced thinly
- ❑ 2 cups frozen greens – spinach, kale, rapini
- ❑ 1/2 cup canned white beans, rinsed and drained
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped sun-dried tomatoes, packed in oil, drained and patted dry (about 2-3 tomato pieces)
- ❑ 1/2 cup parsley leaves, finely chopped
- ❑ 20 chives, finely chopped
- ❑ 10 basil leaves, finely chopped
- ❑ 8 large eggs
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. kosher salt
- ❑ cooking spray

Preheat oven to 350. Heat a small pot of water and bring it to a boil. Add cauliflower and cook until soft, about 5-7 minutes, drain and set aside.

In the meantime, in a large fry pan, heat the olive oil. Cook onion until soft, add the frozen kale and cooked cauliflower, stir to coat and cook until the kale has defrosted. Turn heat off.

Add the white bean, the chopped sun-dried tomatoes and all the herbs and toss to coat. Let cool.

Spray a 12-cup muffin tin well with non-stick spray.

Mix together the 8 eggs, add a couple of tbsp. of water and salt, whisk until frothy. Add cooked vegetable mixture to the eggs and mix well. Pour the mixture evenly into the 12-cup muffin cups – they will overflow a little. Alternatively, you can evenly distribute the veggies in each muffin cup and pour the eggs over the veggies. Cook for 30-35 minutes.

Remove from oven, let sit for about 10 minutes and, using a knife, loosen the frittata cups and remove to cool on a rack. Makes 12 frittata cups, 2 per serving. They will last 2-3 days in the fridge or they freeze well. ■

Painting of Abraham and Isaac restored at MMFA

CJN STAFF

The valuable 17th-century painting Abraham Sacrificing Isaac is now on public display by the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts (MMFA) after 500 hours of painstaking restoration.

The masterpiece by the French Old Master Valentin de Boulogne, dated 1630-31, a treasure that had been hidden for decades in the MMFA's collections, has been brought back to its original glory with funding from Bank of America Merrill Lynch.

Abraham Sacrificing Isaac is on view in the MMFA's Galleries of European Art. The large-scale work will be permanently and prominently displayed at the Michal and Renata Hornstein Pavilion for Peace, now under construction and slated to open late next year.

Rendered in a rich chiaroscuro and painted in Rome, Abraham Sacrificing Isaac depicts the biblical Isaac as a boy passively accepting his fate at the hands of his father Abraham just as a descending angel intervenes.

Because of its deteriorated condition, the painting has not appeared in temporary or travelling exhibitions for 40 years, the MMFA said. It was a gift from Lord Strathcona and his family. The peer, born Donald Alexander Smith, made his fortune building railroads across Canada in the 19th century. He is best known for driving the last spike in the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The Bank of America Merrill Lynch's Art Conservation Project provides grants to museums around the world to conserve historically or culturally significant works of art.

Restoration was urgently needed to save the painting, an oil on canvas measuring about 150 by 185 centimetres (about 5 by 6 feet).

The project was led by Richard Gagnier, head of the MMFA's conservation department, over 11 months.

It included scientific analysis to determine whether the work was left unfinished or was severely abraded in certain areas. This was performed at the Canadian Conservation Institute using the latest X-ray and other technology.

The restoration not only reveals the painting's original splendour, but provides insight into the artist's technique and late career.

These significant discoveries will be the subject of a scholarly article being done by Hilliard Goldfarb, the MMFA's associate chief curator and curator of Old Masters.

A Valentin microsite on the MMFA's website shows the major steps in the restoration process, as well as including a documentary about the painting's 400-year history. www.mbam.qc.ca/en/ ■

Jewish mother says she'll accept son's new career path

DOREEN KUGEL
NOT SO SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A Jewish mother of three adult children says she will probably be OK, at some point, with her youngest son's decision to pursue a career in the arts.

Toronto resident Elaine Adelson, 56, told The CJN she was "blown away" when her son Joshua, 31, informed the family at a dinner last month that he had decided to leave his full-time job at an accounting firm and follow his "life-long dream" of working as a set designer on small-scale theatre productions.

"I just couldn't understand it," said Adelson, who also has a 35-year-old son – a pediatrician – and a 33-year-old daughter – a corporate lawyer at a "very respectable firm."

"Why would you leave a good, stable job to run away and try to be an artist?" Adelson asked. "You want to be an artist? Go paint a picture in your bedroom. No one's stopping you from painting pictures."

Joshua, who clarified that he is not embarking on a career as a painter, explained by phone that he has long been unhappy working as an accountant.

"I'm 31. If I don't make a change now, I'm going to wake up and be, like, 50."

Having worked as a volunteer set designer for years for his university theatre society, summer camp and, more recently, for a local community theatre company, he says he's ready to make set design a full-time occupation and has already started to network in the field.

His savings should last him at least a year, he figures, and after that, if he hasn't landed a steady gig as a set designer, he's willing to work in retail, at least for a little while.

"Maybe don't mention that part to my mother?" he added, after a moment's pause.

"His father and I sent him to all the best schools," Adelson said. "This is how he thanks us? His brother and sister never did anything like this."

Upon his wife's insistence that he "Say something," Joshua's father Herb, 59, a dermatologist, remarked, "When I was his age, I had three kids, a wife and a mortgage."

He then lapsed into a disgruntled silence and referred all subsequent questions to his wife.

> Why would you leave a good stable job to run away and try to be an artist?

Joshua's older brother, Zachary, who Adelson emphasized is married to another doctor, with whom he has two "gorgeous" boys, said that he was, upon hearing Joshua's news, somewhat, but not totally, surprised.

"I guess Josh has always been into artsy stuff," Zachary said reflectively.

"He used to make us go see the plays he worked on and they were intense, man."

Joshua and Zachary's sister, Leora, said she is grateful to her younger brother for "taking the heat off of [her], for a bit."

"I'm over 30, and I'm still single," she told The CJN on a recent visit to her parents' home. "It's nice to hear people talking about something other than my eggs, for once."

"I just don't see why she can't try JDate," shouted her mother, who had been surreptitiously listening from the other room.

In a subsequent interview, Adelson conceded that she thinks she will, eventually, get used to the idea of her son leaving accounting for a job that's "not lucrative, secure or esteemed – Is it even a job?" and continued: "Am I happy? I'm not happy. It's not my choice, but what can I do? Does anybody ask me what I think?"

She also noted that Joshua has recently started dating a "nice Jewish girl – very pretty. Good family," adding that "hopefully, she won't leave him over this."

Joshua – whose volunteer theatre experience has included work on the set of an amateur adaptation of Mordecai Richler's The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz and an avant-garde reimagining of Chaim Potok's The Chosen – said he hopes his family will eventually come to understand his decision, or at the very least leave him alone.

"Honestly, I just want everyone to get off my back." ■

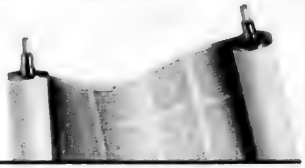
Ki Tisa | Exodus 30:11 - 34:35



Rabbi Aaron Katchen says mishloach manot offer a chance at connection
Rabbi Michal Shekel warns against confusing information with intimacy
Rabbi Howard Morrison compares and contrast Purim and Yom Kippur

Aaron Katchen

"As the days when the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month that was reversed for them from grief to joy and from mourning to a festive day; to make them days of feasting and joy, and sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor" (Esther 9:22).

What do veal, wine, dates, fine flour, spicy peppers and ginger have in common? Besides the start of a luxurious meal, they are the items passed around as part of mishloach manot (sending portions to one another) in the Talmud, which is highlighted in three stories. In those stories, we have the communal leader giving haute cuisine to an impoverished scholar, we have the rosh yeshiva giving sweet gifts based on his humble beginnings, and we have the recipient sending back spicy food as a "sharp" reply. The last instance concerns two poor people who share their Purim meal as their exchange. From these examples, what does the Talmud wish to illuminate regarding this mitzvah?

The 19th-century chassidic master, the Sefat Emet, explains that the purpose of mishloach manot is to bring one to ohev yisrael, a love of fellow Jews, and to build a sense of unity and community. Gift exchanges will often miss the mark when given in the abstract. They risk ego on one side ("Look at how wonderful a gift I am giving.") or anonymity on the other (if everyone gets an orange and a grape juice). Taking these two ideas in tandem, I am given the opportunity every year to consider using mishloach manot to connect/reconnect with someone who matters to me by offering a personalized gift, and to dedicate my gift giving to establish a new relationship and use it as a way to build my community bigger and stronger.

Wishing everyone a Chag Purim Samayach! ■

Rabbi Aaron Katchen is associate executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Concealment is at the heart of Purim. We cite Deuteronomy 31:18 to explain why God's name is absent from the Megillah: "I will keep My countenance hidden on that day" (haster astir), the Hebrew also serving as a pun on "Esther." Our lesson from this verse is that the Divine presence is hidden, not absent.

God's hidden face is also a crucial factor in Ki Tisa. The Golden Calf was created because the people needed some representation of the Divine: it is difficult to relate to the unseen. After this tragic incident Moses, too, has a crisis of faith and asks to see God's face. He is told that God's goodness will pass before him but it is impossible for a human to see the Divine countenance and live.

Still, Moses' encounters with God are described as panim el panim, face to face (Exodus 33:11). The desire for an intimate, close encounter of the Divine kind pervades Ki Tisa. The word panim (face) occurs more than a dozen times in the parshah. Interestingly, at the end of the parshah, after relaying God's teaching to Israel, Moses dons a veil which he only removes when he speaks with God.

Panim el panim runs counter to what we learn in secular society where intimacy means that everything is revealed. While we still crave that face-to-face encounter, social media, reality TV and the like have created an environment of false intimacy and "TMI," too much information. We mistake information for knowledge and confuse it with intimacy, wrongly assuming that the more we know about someone the greater the intimacy.

Ki Tisa teaches that respecting boundaries is essential for intimate encounters. We cannot know, nor do we need to know, everything about the other – human or Divine. Truly intimate knowledge is a bond created through shared understanding and experience. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Howard Morrison

Purim has many levels of meaning. The letters that comprise the Hebrew word Purim stand for "Pesach, V'Sukkot, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Ha'Kippurim, Matan Torah," summarizing the major seasons of the calendar. It's been noted that the fast day, "Yom Ha'Kippurim" (the Day of Atonement) also sounds like "a day like Purim." As a result, many comparisons and contrasts have been offered about the two days. For example, on Yom Kippur, we refrain from such pleasures as eating and drinking. On Purim, we eat and drink during the festive Purim meal. On the eve of Yom Kippur, we eat and drink, then fast on the following day. On the eve of Purim, we fast, then eat and drink on the following day. On Yom Kippur, we remove our masks and display our inner selves before God. On Purim, we don masks and hide our true identities.

While these comparisons are cute and succinct, there is deeper meaning to Purim. For example, in terms of concealment, as exemplified by wearing costumes and even by the absence of God's name in the Megillah, that which is hidden actually becomes revealed. Esther ultimately removes the mask hiding her Jewish identity and reveals her Jewishness to the king, leading to the liberation of our people. Also, while the name of God is absent from the Megillah, we see the role of God between the lines. No wonder we call the text Megillat Esther, which not only means the scroll of Esther, but also, literally, the revealing of that which is hidden.

Yom Kippur and Purim point to contrasts in Jewish behaviour on two days of the year. Ultimately, the rest of the year is found in a lifestyle of moderation between the extremes. Purim also teaches that while we may try to mask our Jewishness and even try to hide from the presence of God, ultimately, we're best served by removing the masks that conceal our Jewishness and accepting the challenges and responsibilities of revealing our true Jewish selves to God and the world around us. ■

Jacob Steinberg: Amazon Jews have rich history

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto-based, Israeli-born Jacob Steinberg, who works in project finance, is the go-to guy for the tiny and isolated Jewish community of Suriname. A small, mostly jungle nation on the northeast shoulder of South America, the former Dutch Guiana is home to no more than 200 Jews whose history traces to the 1630s, when descendants of Jews fled the Spanish Inquisition and came from Holland, Portugal and Italy via Brazil. Steinberg, 65, discovered the oldest continuously existing Jewish community in the Americas, with a rich history and a desire to connect to the outside world. The CJN interviewed him prior to his recent talk at Toronto's Lodzer Synagogue.

How did you discover the Jews of Suriname?

About eight years ago, I was working as a financial consultant for a gold mining company in Toronto, and they asked me to go for two weeks to Suriname. I was more interested to go to northern Mali and the mines there, to Timbuktu and this area. But because I speak Dutch, they asked me to go to Suriname. I wasn't keen. I had very low expectations. I came on a Saturday night and walked around the downtown. It blew my mind. It's a UNESCO Heritage city. I had no idea. And it's all old colonial wooden houses, just beautiful. I saw this magnificent building with Hebrew letters. I didn't know that in this hole-in-the-Amazon basin, there were Jews. I came back and saw a lady painting the building. I introduced myself. She said her name is Lilly [Duym] and she's the vice-president of the community. She started telling me the story. It was like a fairy tale. I came to learn about the community that is now 375 years old. But the story started [during] the Inquisition… the whole journey, how they started during the 1600s searching for a better life. I stayed for two weeks and became part of the community. The two weeks turned into 2-1/2 years, on and off. I just really love the place, and the company asked me to go again and again. They are totally isolated from the Jewish world. They have no access to anything. They bake their own challahs. They have to import everything including matzah and wine for Passover from New York. It costs a fortune. For me, it was a fascinating story.

What is the Jewish population?

It's maybe 200, but with assimilation and intermarriage, about 130 consider themselves practising Jews.

Do they identify as Sephardi or Ashkenazi?

The community was started by Portuguese Jews. But later on, Ashkenazi Jews joined when they became very successful with plantations. Lots of Jews heard about new wealth in the New World and many moved to Suriname. However, they were forbidden from owning plantations. Only the Portuguese Jews could have plantations. So the Ashkenazi Jews started to live in Paramaribo, the new capital, and they established a community there as traders and merchants. Today, there are two groups, Ashkenazi and Sephardi. Up until 20 years ago, each had its own synagogue and they were not intermarrying. It was a totally segregated community. However, the numbers dwindled to a level that neither could have a minyan for Shabbat. So they merged, and they agreed they would worship according to the Portuguese minhag (tradition). But they continue to practise in what used to be the Ashkenazi synagogue, but with the Portuguese nusach [style of service]. They understood that if they kept it Orthodox, they would never have a minyan. So they became liberal. Today, it is egalitarian. But the women still sit on one side, the men on the other.

Jacob Steinberg

Are they in danger of disappearing?

I think so. All the Caribbean Jewish communities are living on borrowed time. The number of Suriname's Jews has never been high. At the peak, around 1737, it was about 1,500 to 2,000 people combined, in Paramaribo and the 17th-century autonomous Jewish colony Jodensavanne. Of them, 800 were in the Jodensavanne. Over the years, the numbers declined, because when Suriname got independence in 1975 from Holland, there was no economic base. There were 500 Jews after independence. Lots of them left – to Holland, Israel, wherever they could go. From 1986 to 1992, there was a civil war. It destroyed everything. So more people left. Over the years, the old have been dying and the young are emigrating or assimilating.

Is there anti-Semitism?

No. The Jews are very well respected. They have always been the backbone of the economy. But over the years, there were so many intermarriages. If a Jewish man married a non-Jew, the wife never converted. So lots of the people in Suriname have Jewish heritage. There is a saying there: "If you shake your family tree, a few Jews will fall." There are lots of streets with Jewish names.

What about relations with Israel?

I was surprised. [Suriname] is one of two countries in the Association of Caribbean States where if you have an Israeli passport, you don't need a visa to visit. Americans and Canadians need visas. Israelis don't. There's also an honorary consul who takes care of consular affairs.

You're the Kulanu co-ordinator for the community. What does that mean?

Kulanu is a U.S.-based organization that tries to help isolated and emerging Jewish communities around the world. When I left Suriname the first time, I said, "I have to do something to help them." I felt there were so many assets they had to maintain: two synagogues, three cemeteries, the Jodensavanne, etc. So I thought of starting a "chai membership." For $18 and up, you could become a member of the synagogue. With friends and people who cared, I put up a website [surinamejewishcommunity.com] that tells the story of the community. So people donated from $18, to $180 for a lifetime membership.

What does the community want from the outside world?

I connected them to other Jewish communities. But nobody else helps, to be honest with you. In New York, there's an Israeli ambassador to the region who comes once in a while to visit. They are totally disconnected from the Jewish world. We decided to make a Taglit-Birthright trip to Israel. It took us three years to arrange, and in 2010 14 kids went to Israel.

Does a rabbi visit?

A rabbi visited around 2000 from the United States. He stayed for about three months and made the first Jewish wedding in 50 years. The community is too small to afford a rabbi, and the rabbis who offer to come are often desperadoes or characters. We are very careful to find out why they're so interested in coming to the Amazon. ■

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

The RRSP season is over!

Where did you put your contribution this year?

Are you still sitting on the sidelines, looking for the best time to go into the markets?

Or do you still believe that you can be "safe" in bonds and fixed interest?

To paraphrase Warren Buffet: "Would you rather have a smooth 2% or a bumpy 8%?"

To paraphrase Yogi Berra: "If you don't know where you are going, you don't need a map."

Can you get where you are going if you don't have a map, or even a destination?

Have you made your RRSP part of an overall Financial Plan?

Let us show you how creating a financial plan can help you achieve your financial dreams and goals and get you to your destination.

Beware the Mossad's vulture spies

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After AFP's "news" showed images of Gaza flooding and alleged in a headline that "Gaza village floods after Israel opens dam gates," Britain's Daily Mail embellished the yarn by declaring that "Hundreds of Palestinians were left homeless after Israel opens river dam and floods houses... hours before Jewish state's electric company cuts off power in Gaza's major West Bank cities."

Rivers and dams in southern Israel? Gaza's major West Bank cities?

Well, they must be thinking of the lush, verdant oasis containing thousands of rivers and Niagara-like waterfalls pouring into mega hydro dams just next to the Gaza border.

We read all sorts of stories in Arab media about Israeli "atrocities," including widely reported bubbe mayses about the effectiveness of the Mossad's animal agents including rats of Judah, high-altitude reconnaissance vultures, dark-op squirrels, strangely kosher pigs, GPS-guided killer sharks and, of course, Stuka-inspired dive pigeons with invisible strings.

Now, close your eyes and imagine this: Mossad vulture spies flying in formation with their vintage aviator trapper caps and goggles over enemy territory, snooping around. Now imagine that one of them is caught and interrogated.

You think I'm pulling your leg? Well, it happened!

"R-65," according Saudi authorities, was a suspicious vulture circling drone-like over the residence of a prominent sheikh near the city of Hayel. Saudi counter-espionage special-ops air services intercepted and arrested the Israeli vulture. Lo and behold, they found a GPS device and a leg tag with the words "Tel Aviv University."

Aha! The Mossad cover story fooled no one. Yeah, right. Tel Aviv University indeed. But to his credit, Prince Bandar released the Prisoner of Zion in January 2011. The story was reported in the Saudi paper Al-Wee. At the time, the "Free R-65 Movement" was credited for the liberation of our bird.

But the Daily Mail?

Would you trust this vulture?

Let us not be surprised if the Daily Mail concocts a new story about white and blue mini piranhas that Israel is alleged to have released into the man-made floods inundating cities in Gaza, "such as Jenin and Nablus." These killer Mini-Me fish designed by none other than Dr. Evil toiling in the hidden zombie labs of Central Zion Control (a.k.a. CZC) apparently have been programmed to go after only Gaza children residing – where else? – in Nablus and Jenin.

However, the best example of anthropomorphism on steroids is the story where a goat was accused of violent vehicle theft. No, I'm not making this up.

In Nigeria in 2009, a goat was apprehended for armed robbery. Yes a goat! Police detained the goat after it was claimed the creature was in fact an armed robber who had used black magic to transform himself into an animal after stealing a Mazda. And despite all efforts, inducements and blandishments to secure the goat's metamorphosis back into the person behind the crime, the robber preferred to stay as a goat and take his chances.

Bring on George Clooney and the Men Who Stare at Goats!

But, in the case of Israel, millions around the world will believe such stories, further cementing the nation's image as a pariah state. Yet many would say, "How on earth could anyone possibly believe such things in this day and age?"

Alice in Wonderland thought the same!

"Alice laughed: "There's no use trying," she said. "One can't believe impossible things."

"I dare say you haven't had much practice," said the Queen. "When I was younger, I always did it for half an hour a day. Why, sometimes I've believed as many as six impossible things before breakfast."

Thanks to the Daily Mail, we're getting all the practice we need! ■

Chai Lifeline

Fighting Illness With Love

Since its establishment nine years ago, Chai Lifeline Canada has touched the lives of hundreds of families with support and programs that help alleviate the fear and isolation of pediatric illness and provide compassion and fortitude that allows families to face each day with renewed hope.

Throughout the year, Canadian families benefit from two-dozen programs and services that include ChaiLine telephone support groups, tutoring, Big Brother/Big Sister programs, family days, retreats and respite, case management, education and advocacy.

Last summer, 400 seriously ill children experienced a summer filled with laughter, love, and sunshine at Camp Simcha or Camp Simcha Special, Chai Lifeline's pioneering overnight camps designed to meet the medical and social needs of seriously ill children. They returned home filled with happy memories, determined to fight the pain of illness for another year.

Every Chai Lifeline Canada program is offered at no charge to families. We rely on you, our friends and supporters, to ensure that our programs and services continue to reach every Canadian family who needs us.

Nimoy tribute goes viral, and there's only one way to get to Jerusalem

'Spocking' goes global

Leonard Nimoy died last month, but his famed alter-ego, Spock, is living on in more than just old Star Trek episodes and movies. As a tribute to the Jewish actor, Canadian fans have long taken to "Spocking" pictures of former prime minister Wilfrid Laurier on five-dollar bills by drawing pointy ears and eyebrows on Canada's seventh prime minister. The practice gained new attention on social media after Nimoy's death, leading a Bank of Canada spokesperson to say last week that while it's not illegal, defacing bank notes is "inappropriate."

Living long and prospering on a fiver.

Portugal lays out path to citizenship

The government of Portugal has published its procedure for handling applications for citizenship based on the country's law of return for descendants of Sephardi Jews. The new procedure is based on legislation passed in 2013 and establishes the entitlement of descendants of Sephardi Jews to Portuguese nationality that was deprived of them due to religious and racist persecution as of 1492, the year widely accepted as the beginning of the Inquisition, which forced hundreds of thousands of Jews to emigrate under duress. The new regulation stipulates that applicants must present a document issued by a Portugal-based Portuguese community attesting as to their Portuguese Sephardi ancestry. Spain has initiated similar legislation for similar reasons but its Congress has not yet voted on any bill.

Israeli tourism ad called misleading

Britain's advertising watchdog banned an official Israeli tourism ad for showing the Old City of Jerusalem. The ad, inserted in British newspapers, showed a view of the Old City with the words "Israel has it all" on it. The Advertising Standards Authority ruled March 4 the ad is misleading since it implies the Old City is part of Israel. The agency was responding to an official complaint. The international community doesn't recognize Israel's claim over eastern Jerusalem. Israel said it wasn't trying to make a political statement, noting that the Old City can only be visited by travelling to Israel. ■

How many hamantashen?

What colour is "this hamantashen?" And on the front page, too? (March 5) Please repeat after me: one hamantash, two hamatashen.

Memories of Emerson Mahon

I knew Emerson Swift Mahon ("Emerson Swift Mahon: Canada's first black Jew," Feb. 26). He rented accommodation from my grandparents in Winnipeg while he worked as a sleeping car porter. We lived next door. Every time he saw us he would stop to talk and impressed us with his stories and knowledge of Yiddishkeit.

He was always learning and studying, and I recall many a time he and my grandfather would sit and discuss and argue about the Torah. It always bothered me that such a knowledgeable man was relegated to work as a sleeping car porter.

Awe and fear

Rabbi Yael Splansky translates the Hebrew word yira as fear (of God) ("Be not afraid, for God is with you," Feb. 12). It can also be interpreted as awe.

Just like the Hebrew words ruach and davar can be translated, respectively, as wind or spirit and thing or word, in the material and immaterial senses, so can yira have negative and positive interpretations. In the modern age, it is easier to speak of being in awe of God and His creation rather than fearing God.

Jewish values are Canadian

In an interview with The CJN, Jonathan Kay concludes with the statement that he was born Jewish and acknowledges that he is a Jew, but is primarily Canadian ("Walrus editor discusses the media and Judaism," Feb. 19).

Kay says he doesn't "like practices that go against Canadian values." Inherent in these remarks is the idea that some Jewish behaviour clashes with Canadian values.

He makes reference to the bigoted remarks he hears about Muslims in the synagogues that he frequents, reads in comment sections of newspapers or emails that he receives with Jewish names. He is also bothered by the ultra-Orthodox Jews who live in Outremont and the lifestyles they follow.

Kay then goes a little further. He likens the ultra-Orthodox Jewish community to what went on with Catholic priests and the coverups by the Catholic church.

Finally, Kay believes that ultra-Orthodox Jews are, on an existential level, a threat to the Jewish People.

Jews of all stripes should recognize that along with the Canadian values which we all cherish, we can also take pride in our Jewish values, which are human values.

York U and anti-Semitism

For years, I have failed to understand how insidious anti-Semitism continues to run rampant at a university with a high percentage of Jewish students and professors, specifically York University. The article, "University free speech can be unsettling," (Feb. 5) reveals the reasons this "unsettling" trend continues.

Now it is abundantly clear why Israeli Apartheid Week found fertile ground at York and why it festers throughout the year. Under the guise of free speech these academics justify ongoing anti-Semitism. As a result, the most heinous lies against Israel are continuously ignored, even if it compromises the safety of Jewish students.

The authors also believe that ongoing anti-Semitic harassment, which often borders on dangerous intimidation, is in fact, a good thing, because it can sharpen a student's power of verbal sparring! This appalling dismissal of ongoing anti-Semitism is not what patrons, parents and students expect from any university.

We all must help universities reclaim their rightful place as reputable institutions of higher education. We all must help prevent universities from being used as havens for anti-Semites and leftists to freely ply their wares. But first, we all must demand that these academics immediately stop making excuses for ongoing anti-Semitic activities and start being part of the solution. ■

The time had come for my wife's unveiling. My kids and I wanted a monument that honoured her memory and captured who she was. A stone of lasting beauty, so that when we visited her grave, we felt close to her. The monument counsellor at Benjamin's Landmark designed a custom stone at a price we could afford. They truly took the utmost care.

The art and skill of giving rebuke

Criticism is hard to receive and hard to give, but effective critique of ethical lapses can keep societies, families and congregations from collapsing

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Fishman: "Reprove a wise person, and they will love you" (Proverbs 9:8). Have you ever found yourself on the receiving end of someone else's rebuke? I'm not sure what thoughts go through your mind at that moment, but occasionally I think to myself, "How can I love this person even more?"

If our goal is to become better people, fighting for truth and spiritual growth, then to be told of a misstep would certainly be welcome. Indeed I have witnessed in the growth of children that those who are not reprimanded or ever disciplined seem to have an insecurity to them. There seems to be the lasting fear and questioning on behalf of the spoiled child: why was I not reprimanded for this?

Of course, there is an art and skill to giving rebuke.

Rabbi Splansky: That's the trick.

Two thousand years ago, the Mishnaic Sage Rabbi Tarfon asked, "I wonder whether there is anyone in this generation who knows how to accept reproof," while Rabbi Elazar ben Azariah quipped, "I wonder if there is anyone in this generation who knows how to give reproof" (Babylonian Talmud, Archin 16b).

Criticism is hard to receive and hard to give in such a way that it can be received. But effective critique of ethical lapses can keep a society, a congregation, a family from collapse.

Rabbi Fishman: During this season, our thoughts turn to the Haggadah and one of its most well-known sections: the four sons. Is a child really deemed so bad that they are defined as the "Wicked Child"? Does not such "profiling" lead to a certain self-fulfilling prophecy?

A serious and soul-searching question is being raised. "Mum/Dad, I don't care about this seder/religion/celebration because I never saw you get excited about it, either. If you never gave me the tools with which to appreciate it, how do you expect me to be meaningfully engaged?"

Rabbi Splansky: The "Rasha," the "Rebellious Child" is by far the most interesting character. If I had to choose just one of the four "children" for my seder, I'd choose the one who would challenge my thinking, even if irreverently. We don't only set a place for the "Rasha" at our table because he needs our attention and guidance. We draw him nearer, because we need him, too. Every edgy question he lobs at the festive table gives us the opportunity to articulate our own convictions, our own faith, our own commitment to bringing the world "from degradation to exaltation."

To the Rasha we mustn't just speak flowery words of platitudes. We have to show him. However, if he's agreed to sit at the table, he's already engaged, and if he enjoys critical thinking, then with the right teachers and role models he can become a Chacham, a wise one.

Rabbi Fishman: A story is told that a person came to the famed Rebbe Elimelech of Lizhensk asking to be forgiven for his behaviour. Reb Elimelech decreed that for such a misdemeanour, the harsh and painful consequence of having burning oil poured down his throat was his only salvation.

With a broken heart and great humility, the man agreed and accepted his fate. Closing his eyes, he opened his mouth and at that moment, the rabbi took a spoon full of honey and placed it in his mouth instead. "You have made a full atonement," declared the Rabbi. "Now go out back into the world and use your talents for the good, become the righteous person you know you can become."

Rabbi Splansky: I've heard that story over the years, and I admit, it still terrifies me. The learning is gleaned from the Jew in the story who was self-aware enough to know he needed to change. His search for another's critique is a sign of the strength of his character.

We Jews are especially critical of one another. It is not an attractive trait. But when the criticism is borne from love and offered with love, it can create cohesion of thought and purpose. It can protect our "kinsmen" who are vulnerable at the margins. Moreover, when we seek out criticism from one another, we build trusting relationships and discover our finer selves.

How to advance ourselves in the art of Jewish criticism? Be ever mindful that more than we want to be right, we want to be good. ■

Toronto City Councillor James Pasternak spoke at a rally March 3, the day Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu addressed the U.S. Congress, in support of Israel and to raise awareness of the dangers of a nuclear Iran. The rally was held by the group Concerned Canadians Against Nuclear Iran in front of the United States Consulate in Toronto.

From Yoni's Desk

What's the Diaspora's role in Israeli elections?

After an intense and divisive election campaign, it's almost time to find out just what the future holds for Israel. And as Israelis prepare to go to the polls on March 17, Diaspora Jews are watching with great interest and anticipation. The former are tasked with deciding the makeup of the next Knesset, while the latter are left to debate a question that may be even more difficult to answer: what role does the Diaspora play when it comes to an Israeli election?

It's important for Jews around the world to be well informed about this election's main players and parties, and the central issues at stake. The good news is it's never been easier to stay on top of the latest news and commentary from Israel (not to mention those viral campaign ads, which have been among the more entertaining developments of this campaign). If you haven't been following the action since Benjamin Netanyahu's governing coalition dissolved in early December, there's still time to catch up. And given the frenetic pace of Israeli politics, a few more twists and turns are likely.

But having amassed the requisite pre-election insight, what next?

Many argue that's where Diaspora participation in this Israel election – in any Israeli election – ends. Because for all the available information, all the video streams and Facebook comment threads, unless you're there on the ground, your opinion doesn't count. That viewpoint was articulated last week by Yoni Leviatan, a self-described "British-born, American-raised, Israeli-blooded oleh," who criticized anti-Netanyahu voices in America in a blog for the Times of Israel.

"If you want to be a good Jew, and you want to support the State of Israel even though you disagree with its prime minister," he wrote, "then you're left with only two options: 1. Make aliyah and vote Bibi out of office [or] 2. Shut the fk up."

Others might not have put it so bluntly, but Leviatan's opinion is a popular one – in Israel especially, but also in the Diaspora. Still, it seems disingenuous, perhaps even disrespectful, to suggest Diaspora Jews don't have any voice when it comes to Israeli politics. After all, our communities are inextricably tied to Israel in so many ways – emotionally, politically, financially, spiritually – and it only makes sense that we would want to experience the passion and debate of the campaign. We have something riding on the outcome, too – not in the same way or to the same degree as Israelis, but it's there all the same. Under the circumstances, it's hard to stay quiet, to hold it all inside. Sometimes it can be too much to handle.

Israel's election laws contain no allowance for absentee ballots – unless you're away on official state business, you literally have to be in Israel on March 17 in order to vote. Perhaps that's just as well, because there's no substitute for living in Israel. As vibrant and diverse as Diaspora communities are, the Jewish State stands as the pinnacle of Jewish life.

That is as it should be. But you can't blame the rest of us for wanting to be part of it in our own way, especially at this pivotal moment. ■ — YONI

'People are really good at heart'

Seventy years after her death, it's time to ask: was Anne Frank right?

Eli Rubenstein

As we mark 70 years since the death of Anne Frank – in Bergen-Belsen some time in March of 1945, just weeks before liberation – it is worth recalling the devastating critique Cynthia Ozick wrote for the New Yorker almost 20 years ago.

In her well known essay, Ozick actually suggested that it would have been better if Anne Frank's work had been burned, and never seen the light of day.

Yet, when one re-rereads her writing one can't help but be amazed by the literary skill and idealism on display in The Diary of a Young Girl, a work that has been translated into 67 languages and read by 30 million people.

Anne Frank was thinking and writing about subjects that many – myself included – would only begin to contemplate much later in life, and expressing herself in ways which most writers far beyond her years could only hope to aspire to. And this from a 14-year-old girl locked in an attic for two years…

Here are just a few small examples:

"No one has ever become poor by giving."

"The best remedy for those who are afraid, lonely or unhappy is to go outside, somewhere where they can be quite alone with the heavens, nature and God. Because only then does one feel that all is as it should be and that God wishes to see people happy, amidst the simple beauty of nature. As longs as this exists, and it certainly always will, I know that then there will always be comfort for every sorrow, whatever the circumstances may be."

"You can be lonely even when you are loved by many people, since you are still not anybody's one and only."

Perhaps her most famous quote is this one: "It's really a wonder that I haven't dropped all my ideals, because they seem so absurd and impossible to carry out. Yet I keep them, because in spite of everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart."

So what disturbed Ozick so much?

Of course, Ozick was not criticizing Anne Frank but, rather, what had become of her after her death – the way her story was diluted and distorted – especially by the overuse and misuse of the "good at heart" quote mentioned above.

Ozick argued that the Broadway play and film about Anne Frank removed almost all references to Anne Frank's Jewishness and the culpability of the Germans, along with most expressions of pessimism and sadness recorded in her diary, transforming her ultimately tragic story, into an upbeat, redemptive tale of humour and hope.

Ozick was especially infuriated by the prevailing usage of the phrase "people are really good at heart," because it eclipsed many other foreboding statements Anne makes in her diary. Most importantly, Ozick felt that Anne's betrayal, deportation to Auschwitz and death in Bergen-Belsen, belie the sentiment that "people are really good at heart." In Ozick's words, the damnable phrase is "torn from its bed of thorns," "pulls the wool over the eyes of history," and obscures the ultimate fate of the person who wrote it.

Perhaps camp survivor, Bruno Bettelheim best summed up the challenge to Anne Frank's most famous line by responding: "If all men are good (at heart), there never was an Auschwitz."

Anne Frank

Indeed would Anne Frank have ever written these words in Auschwitz or Bergen-Belsen? Would she have stuck by them had she survived?

So, then, how do we preserve in our young people the innocent belief in the goodness of humanity, expressed by Anne Frank, when faced with the grim reality of Auschwitz? Should we? Does the Holocaust, in fact, not teach us that humanity is inherently evil? And if we concur, are we not, in a strange twist, proclaiming Hitler victorious? For, if humanity is so utterly hopeless, so beyond salvation, why should we indeed care one whit about each other?

Here, I believe, lies the answer to the divide between Anne Frank and Cynthia Ozick/Bruno Bettelheim. Anne Frank was right – one may argue. The majority of people are good at heart – but that is not nearly enough. We must also act, stand up, make a difference. Otherwise we become accomplices to the victimizers – and ultimately, the enablers of Auschwitz.

This message, indeed, has much resonance in Jewish thought, for, as often noted, Judaism is a religion of "deed and not creed." We care much more about your actions, than about the interior landscape of your thoughts and beliefs. Moral action is always to be preferred over pious sentiment.

Indeed the Holocaust did not happen only because of its infinitely evil perpetrators – but because most of the world's good people did not stand up straight enough or soon enough.

Anne Frank died because not enough people who were "good at heart" mostly people like you and I acted upon their beliefs.

Perhaps Anne Frank's words were more of a wish, a prayer, than a hard and fast statement about human nature.

It is up to us to not only fulfill Anne's words, but to surpass them, to not only be good at heart, but to act on those good intentions.

So that one day, no more precious children like Anne Frank and millions of others, will have their pure and hope-filled ideals so utterly betrayed, and left to a fate no child should ever suffer. ■

As election looms, our experts weigh in

AVI BENLOLO
President and CEO of Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Unlike the American political system, which has two parties (Democratic and Republican), or the Canadian system with three main parties (Conservative, Liberal, NDP), Israel is represented by some 34 political parties. Predicting Israel's upcoming election results is, therefore, a near impossibility.

The mood in Israel today is twofold: fearful and impatient, with a desire for change. On one hand, Israelis are hyper-concerned about the threats that surround them, including a nuclear Iran, missiles from Hamas and Hezbollah, and an Islamic State spillover from Syria. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has done a relatively good job of keeping Israel safe.

On the other hand, a consequence of the natural human need for change is that most Israelis are ready for new leadership. This is why the Zionist Union headed by Isaac Herzog and Tzipi Livni is leading in the polls. However, in Israel, it's safety first. This is why Netanyahu is likely to triumph, although very much weakened by the social change most Israelis seek.

I believe the next government will form a fractured coalition in the Knesset. Whatever the outcome, you can bet one thing for sure: the next election will be right around the corner – again. ■

AVRUM ROSENSWEIG
President and CEO of Ve'ahavta, The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

The Jewish People and the State of Israel are as complex as the characters in a Russian novel.

Three of my nieces, sisters in their 30s, have different views of the Israeli elections.

Miriam, a mother of seven who lives next to an Arab village, hopes Benjamin Netanyahu will continue to be the prime minister. She says his coalition would include "[Naftali] Bennett, the haredi parties, and either Lapid's Yesh Atid or Lieberman's Yisrael Beitenu." She doesn't want to think about a Labor victory.

Devorah, from Efrat, is voting for Meretz, a secular party that "will provide human rights for all its citizens." Devorah states, "I support their lobbying for women's rights. I want my kids to not think they are better because they're Jewish, to not make decisions in life based on the Holocaust, and to learn to live together with the overall population."

Deena, a prolific writer living in Jerusalem, doesn't care about the elections. Deena writes, "I believe in grassroots initiatives since I think politics brings out the worst in people."

That will be the outcome of the Israeli elections – a structure voted in by millions of (mostly) Jews, with divergent views hoping for a plethora of outcomes for Israel. Complex! ■

MICHAEL DIAMOND
Toronto consultant, entrepreneur, investor and philanthropist.

UJA Federation's shinshinim created an informative website about the Israeli election, www.voteisrael2015.com, that asks visitors to cast simulated ballots. Thusly encouraged, and unlike previous Israeli elections when I simply watched and squirmed, this year, I tried to behave like an Israeli and vote.

I decided to vote for Kulanu – a Likud-like party that is not Likud and includes former Israeli ambassador to the United States Michael Oren on its list, as well as several others from different parts of Israeli society, many of whom have a focus on the economy and security. Kulanu, I believe, could form part of either a left- or right-oriented coalition.

But then I thought: who am I to suggest my vote ought to matter, given that I'm a Canadian who doesn't have to run to air-raid shelters when missiles fly, pay high levels of taxes to support Israel's military, or see my sons risk their lives in the IDF?

Those who are fully invested Israelis should know much better than I what must be done to enhance and protect their lives. After all, it is they who must deal with the outcomes. I can only watch, offer support and cheer from the sidelines. ■

BERNIE FARBER
Former chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress.

At the best of times, Israeli elections are fraught with complexities and a myriad of candidates and parties, so you often need a score card to know the players.

This time, Israelis are voting in what is ostensibly the most complicated and vital election in their country's history.

Iran, the economy, right-wing parties, left-wing parties, centre-left, centre-right, a national housing crisis – all will play a role in who comes out on top. But in Israeli politics, the party that wins the most seats doesn't necessarily determine who will be prime minister.

Over the last year, it looked like Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had a lock on victory. However, recent events suggest it's more of a horse race.

Most parties have sophisticated internal polling procedures run by some of the best pollsters money can buy. For instance, as reported in the Israeli press, internal polling by all the key parties suggests Yair Lapid's Yesh Atid is set to gain the most. And a recent Panels poll, with an admittedly small sample, shows a trend away from Netanyahu: 60 per cent said they don't want him as prime minister after the March 17 vote.

When the majority in poll after poll point to the economy as the key issue in this election, you know storm clouds are on the horizon for Likud. ■

One of the best contemporary works of fiction I've read in the last few years has been Israeli-Canadian Ayelet Tsabari's 2013 debut collection of short stories, The Best Place on Earth.

The characters and settings draw the reader in effortlessly. The conflicts are both internal and situational, and they feel urgent and real. The writing is intelligent, sexy and restrained. The judges of the prestigious Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature clearly thought so, too, as the book is the latest winner of the $100,000 (US) award.

I caught up with the Toronto-based Tsabari by phone in Israel, where she was visiting family and friends. She is insightful, thoughtful and articulate, as well as warm and humble – she told me she was "shocked" when she heard the news of the prize. We spoke about identity, the short story form, her favourite hidden summer spot, what makes a novel Canadian and Israeli, and how to write a decent sex scene.

One of the first things that comes to mind in Tsabari's writing is the ethnicity of the characters: almost all are Mizrachi, a label with which she herself identifies.

"It was really important to me to have Mizrachi characters who go about their lives, and not having their Mizrachi [identity] be an issue. That's never questioned when you have stories about Ashkenazis. That's the default. I wanted to shatter that, to break the pattern."

Some of Tsabari's stories are set in Canada – there's a memorable one set on Hornby Island, the tiny B.C. oasis whose peacefulness she found she was mentally contrasting with the intensity of Jerusalem – and another in Toronto. Most are set in Israel, though, revealing important themes about life, love and loss set against the background of physical insecurity. Tsabari wrote the book in Canada, was mentored by another Canadian author, Camilla Gibb, and acknowledged that others have told her the book possesses a Canadian sensibility.

Tsabari confided that she tried to avoid writing a conventionally "political" book. "I didn't want to write about the war, about conflict. What I'm interested in is people's lives… But I wanted to set it against that backdrop. This is how I grew up. It's always there – the conflict, that sense of menace."

Still, she did have what she considers a political aim. She wanted to give voice to a place that is often better known to outsiders through the media. She wanted to "complicate things," she told me, to "focus on the lives of one family… and one person, rather than the mass of people you see when you watch the news."

I asked her why she chose the short story form. While she is currently working on a couple of longer-form projects, she told me that she "love[s] the brevity of [short stories]. I love imagining a life in a short span. I love the idea of a collection." She added, "It's kind of like travelling… You get to know people, you really feel like they're a part of you, you forge what you think are life lasting relationships, then you move on. And because so many of the characters [in the book] are transient and nomads, immigrants and travellers, I felt that the container fit."

As for how to write a good sex scene, Tsabari explained that writers should provide as much detail as they would for any other type of scene, include it only if it advances the plot, and above all, avoid euphemisms. It's good advice, really, that could be applied to most everyday interactions: as we encounter one another, we should strive to understand the inner lives of people as they really are. And as readers, we can be grateful for glimpses of our country's fine new voices helping us understand other places at the same time as we are able to discover new truths about ourselves. ■

Where is the integrity?

Mordechai Ben-Dat

A commentary headlined "Is Zionism Past its Expiry Date?" by Patrick Martin, which appeared Feb. 20 in the online edition of the Globe and Mail, is a textbook example of an anti-Israel polemic. Quite apart from its questionable content however, perhaps its most egregious quality is the devious, indirect manner by which its content finds the page, so to speak.

Space does not allow an adequate parsing of the commentary. Indeed, it could form the basis of a seminar on how to detect an oblique, anti-Israel rebuke. But it's important for readers – not only supporters of Israel – to recognize some of the arch devices typically used by an author or speaker intent on doing indirectly what he or she will not attempt directly.

The drive-by smear: At the very outset, i.e., in the third paragraph, the author seemingly innocuously and gratuitously mentions the "Zionism-as-a-form-of-racism" resolution passed by the UN General Assembly in 1975 to support an entirely subjective, insupportable proposition that "not since 1975… has the subject [Zionism] been so hotly contested." The statement is absurd on its face. Anyone who follows the unceasing, myriad public debates in and about Israel would know this. The nature of an evolving Zionism is constantly discussed in Israel, and especially so during general elections. Worse, inexplicable and deeply troubling is the fact the author fails to mention anywhere in the subsequent text that the General Assembly actually revoked that scurrilous resolution in 1991.

Non-representative sources: The four politicians on whose views the author primarily relies to illustrate his thesis – Hanin Zoabi, Avigdor Liberman, Naftali Bennett and Avraham Burg – are decidedly not from the mainstream of the Israeli electorate. The author also quotes a Tel Aviv University professor who criticizes the very name of the newly combined Labor-Hatnua party list, the Zionist Camp. He does so by again repeating the "racist" invective in a clearly implied reference to Zionism.

Partial truths and omitted contexts: The author cites the attempt to disqualify Zoabi from standing for election to make a point about today's Zionist advocates. He fails to provide the context for this effort, namely her outrageously hostile behaviour toward the state. Nor does he mention that in the past, Jewish candidates, too, due to their extremist actions, have been barred from standing for election. The author presents extreme positions – and in the case of Burg's point of view, entirely marginal to the vast majority of Jews in Israel – as normative ones in reference to the debate about Zionism.

The provocative headline. It is unlikely the author was involved in writing the piece's headline. However, it effectively illustrates the wily bias prevalent against the Jewish state. Zionism is the national liberation movement of the Jewish People. Of the 193 member states of United Nations General Assembly, only one is Jewish. Why, of all nationalisms, must this one still justify its existence?

The early, unqualified association in the article between Zionism and racism and the subsequent extremist proof texts the author cites in reference to that association leave one suspecting that the intent of the piece was to once again re-plant that crooked flag of "Zionism-equals-racism" in the mental terrain of the genuinely unaware and/or smugly pleased anti-Israel reader.

The currency of a newspaper is its credibility. Whether readers believe in a newspaper rests upon far more than the accuracy of the facts in its stories. We all understand that errors of fact or other mistakes can creep into a work in any number of unintended ways.

Credibility, rather, rests on a far more substantial base than "mere" accuracy. It rests upon perceived integrity. Integrity, of course, is a broad concept, but we would all agree that it encompasses, at the very least, honesty, fairness, ethical treatment and an overall loyalty to principles of truthfulness. The Globe and Mail's Feb. 20 commentary encompasses none of those qualities. Unfortunately, it shakes one's belief in the newspaper's integrity. ■

We need a new model for day school funding

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Imagine if a business that had been growing for 50 years suddenly, over six short years, lost one-third of its customers. Such a scenario would lead either to a restructuring of the business or its demise. Management and the board would devote endless energy to engineering a turnaround. New ideas and innovative thinking would be the order of the day.

Sadly, we in the Jewish community are also losing customers at an alarming rate. Intermarriage, assimilation and apathy have become the norm. As the 2013 Pew report on U.S. Jewry noted, roughly the same number of U.S. Jews have a Christmas tree as are members of a synagogue. And our most effective tool for developing serious and engaged Jews, the day school, is in a state of near-collapse. Like many crises, the situation seems fine, but there are cracks below the surface for those who dig a bit deeper.

It was distressing to read that the Ottawa Jewish Community School will be closing its high school, the only such co-ed Jewish institution in the capital. It joins a growing list of Jewish schools that have shut their doors in recent years.

I'm a teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Toronto's Jewish community high school. After peaking at around 1,530 students six short years ago, the expected enrolment for the 2015-16 academic year is just over 1,000 students. This is a staggering statistic, one – that as far as I can tell – has gone largely unnoticed in the Toronto Jewish community. This represents more than 500 students who are much more likely to intermarry and much less likely to be involved in the Jewish community as they build families. And for the number crunchers out there, it means fewer donors to our communal needs. A Jewish day school with 500 students would be one of the largest in North America.

And lest anyone think the decline has to do with quality of education, TanenbaumCHAT can boast a 98 per cent retention rate among students who do attend, the highest of any private school in Canada.

Yet, there is no sense of urgency in the community about the declining numbers in so many of our schools, nor has there been a serious discussion of the implications for the future. Will there be Jews interested in filling the beautiful campuses we've built and are building for our descendants?

While there may be many contributing factors to the decline, one hovers above them all: affordability. With the inflation rate for day school fees being at least double the rate of general inflation, it truly is becoming less and less affordable to give our children, the Jewish future, a day school education.

Many of our communal leaders feel the problem is unsolvable and argue that unless we receive government funding – something that is not imminent in Ontario, to say the least – Jewish education will become more and more the exclusive domain of the financial elite. Already, UJA Federation of Toronto allocates more funding to Jewish education than any other community in North America, and with so many other needs, many say there is little that can be done.

Can it really be that the wealthiest community in Jewish history can't afford to educate its children? The cost of failure is too great to allow that to happen. As I have elaborated upon in the past in these pages, solutions exist. It will cost some money. However with the financial tools and sophisticated investment strategies available today, the actual cost is much less than is commonly imagined.

But more than money – which exists in our community in unprecedented abundance – we need innovative leadership. The same ingenuity that so many have used to flourish financially must be brought to bear as we restructure the financial model of Jewish education – an education that must be available to all and a financial burden for none. ■

Love: where can we find it?

Norma Baumel Joseph

Recently, Anat Hoffman and I shared our divergent views about Women of the Wall in these pages. The dispute was respectful and transparent. However, Anat's column had the headline, "Norma, I love you but…" The statement bothered me and got me thinking. What is love, what does it mean when we declare love and how do we know?

It seems to me, after almost 50 years of marriage with the love of my life, that love is not simply an emotional state. It is not merely a suffusing of chemicals in the brain. Love must derive from a relationship and implicate a very real commitment. Without those elements, true love cannot exist.

We can be enamoured of someone, we can "love" a food or a place or some work of art. But without a human connection that entails what Martin Buber called an "I Thou" exchange, there is no love. It is perhaps possible to have such an interface with a work of art, but the fullest sense of love is only experienced in human terms, with actions and interactions. We are, of course, human beings with bodies and thoughts and emotions. All our parts need involvement.

In biblical terms, the most desirable human relationship of love is that experienced between a woman and a man, intent on each other, made for each other like Eve and Adam. The purpose of human existence would seem to be to find the right person with whom one can share the totality of one's being: "bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh."

According to Rabbi J.B. Soloveitchik, the story unfolds in order to teach us the absolute human need for companionship and love. Those essential elements are only found with another human being with whom one can share everything, physical and spiritual, hopes, dreams and expectations.

This very human love is then the prototype for the most exalted and desirable theological stance: the love for God. What a glorious idea. To learn to love God based on our own finite and imperfect experience of loving another human being. Given this proposition, the Bible commands us to "Love God!" We can find that love, reach for it and express it. But how?

> Love must derive from a relationship and implicate a very real commitment

In the well-known prayer, Shema, we commit to loving God. We state that we shall love God with all our might, with all our being, with total dedication and allegiance. As a result of this commitment, or in consequence of the love, we pledge to pay attention to God's words and to keep them with us. So love necessitates an act of some sort – because the act itself either constitutes the love or celebrates it.

We state this in the plural form, as a community, not simply individually. We bind our descendants and ourselves to both the love and the ritual action. How can we?

In the classical prayer book, there is a significant prayer that precedes the Shema. In it, we wisely and prudently remind God to love us. This relationship then is a two-way street. We ask and even demand that God love us in preparation for our love of God. We ask in the name or merit of our ancestors, we ask for our past and our future. We need to learn and to teach the ways of God so that this love will be a standard for our family and community. This love is a result of action and interaction of relationships with the living and the dead. It entails many activities of learning, doing, committing and uniting. And it leads to joy and gladness, to redemption and intimacy. It is both existential – crucial in shaping our destiny –and actual – necessary for life now.

I have known such human love and glimpsed the attendant divine love. It requires real time acts and relationships, of that I am convinced.

No, Anat, sorry, but you don't love me. You don't even know me. ■

Israeli prenup to help agunot likely not effective in Canada

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Israeli rabbinical and legal experts unveiled a new prenuptial agreement last week meant to end the phenomenon of agunot – women "chained" to husbands who refuse to grant them a divorce – but Canadians will likely have to find their own solutions to the problem.

The Israeli proposal requires maintenance payments of up to half the spouse's salary until a religious divorce, or get, is issued. Disputes would go to a religious court for arbitration.

But in Ontario, courts won't enforce the decision of religious courts on matters of family law, so there's no legal way to enforce the prenups, said Yael Machtinger, a PhD candidate in socio-legal studies at York University whose thesis focuses on agunot. In addition, many Orthodox rabbis in Canada don't want to push couples entering marriage to agree to a prenup, she said.

Rabbi Dovid Shochet, a member of the beit din (religious court) of the Orthodox Vaad Harabonim in Toronto, said "a prenup is not a new invention." It is a contractual obligation that would be enforced in a secular court, not in Jewish religious courts. And ketubot, the Jewish marriage contract, usually are written with a requirement that a husband support their spouse, making a prenup redundant, he said.

The Israeli proposal was introduced by Tzohar, an Orthodox Zionist group whose stated goal is to nurture "moderate, rabbinic leadership and shaping public policy." Tzohar's proposal was developed in conjunction with the Israel Bar Association.

The prenuptial agreement, which was six years in the making and went through 16 different drafts, contemplates that spouses on the verge of breaking up should spend six months trying to resolve their differences. If that fails and one spouse refuses to grant a divorce, that spouse is required to pay the other 6,000 shekels a month or half the person's salary, whichever is more. This is meant to discourage dragging out the divorce process.

"No one deserves to stay chained in a terrible marriage with a knife at their throat," said Rabbi David Stav, chair of Tzohar.

In a phone interview from Israel, Rabbi Stav said the prenups are purely voluntary, but Tzohar rabbis officiate at 5,000 marriages a year, meaning more and more couples are getting the protection the document affords in the case of marriage breakdown

Tzohar is engaged in a campaign to convince new couples to agree to the prenups – and married ones as well. He and his wife, Aviva, recently signed their own prenup after decades of marriage, he said.

In North America, the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) years ago introduced its own prenup, adjudicated by its associate organization, the Beth Din of America, which sits as an arbitration panel. The prenups have become more popular since being introduced more than 15 years ago, said Rabbi Michael Whitman of Adath Israel Poale Zedek synagogue in Montreal.

"There are many rabbis, hundreds probably, across North America who will only officiate at a wedding if the couple agrees to the prenup. I'm one of them," he said.

"When done properly, it virtually ends the problem of recalcitrant spouses."

The RCA prenup does not have the same impact in Canada. "It appears the RCA document will not be upheld by a Canadian court, because the courts in Canada will only allow monetary penalties imposed by courts, not by rabbis [or] panels," he said.

To address this issue, Rabbi Whitman wrote his own prenup 12 years ago. It's weaker than the RCA one in that it doesn't include financial commitments, he conceded. But it has proven effective. By reminding spouses they've agreed to abide by Jewish law, it has great persuasive effect, he said.

"I'm now working on a new document that will be acceptable to Canadian courts," he added, saying he has consulted with lawyers, law professors and retired judges to ensure it complies with Canadian law.

"We are close to a final document" that he hopes will be adopted by rabbis across the country.

Machtinger said in her graduate work, she has interviewed dozens of women in Toronto and New York who are agunot. Many Orthodox rabbis have tried to address the problem by refusing to marry couples unless they've signed a prenup. "It's the best solution we have at this time," she said.

In Canada, "rabbis have to be willing to use a prenup when they marry couples. A beit din has to be willing to enforce a prenup. It seems they're not willing to use this," she said, noting that many say it's not appropriate to introduce the idea of divorce when a couple is contemplating a long and happy marriage.

Rabbi Schochet said ketubot already stipulate a husband must support his spouse until they're divorced, so there's no advantage in including that in a prenup. And at any rate, the province won't enforce a beit din decision regarding maintenance under either a prenup or a ketubah. In Israel, courts will enforce a prenup, he said.

There's also no mechanism available to compel couples to enter a prenuptial agreement, he said. He acknowledged that in New York, "a few rabbis make it [mandatory], but not many." The last thing couples want to hear when getting married is about a divorce, he added.

But south of the border, "they're making it part of the culture, it's normalized," Machtinger said. In fact, Rabbi Jeremy Stern, executive director of the Organization for the Resolution of Agunot (ORA), organizes prenup parties. The idea is that a prenup reflects a couple's love for each other and says that even if a marriage ends, neither party would use denial of a get to hurt the other party, she said. ■

Toronto-born educator to head Ramaz School in NYC

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rabbi Eric Grossman.

Rabbi Eric Grossman, 43, a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), has been named incoming head of school at the Ramaz School in Manhattan, a modern Orthodox day school encompassing preschool through Grade 12.

He will replace Paul Shaviv, who served for 14 years as director of education at what is now known as TanenbaumCHAT before joining Ramaz three years ago.

Shaviv described Ramaz at the time as "sort of the flagship Jewish high school" in New York and the United States. Shaviv, who was on contract at the school, said his future plans include "more independent work, and some writing."

"I have greatly enjoyed my three 'transitional' years, and wish Rabbi Grossman every success," he added.

Ramaz, which has 1,150 students, has "a wonderful reputation in the day school world," Rabbi Grossman told The CJN in an email interview.

For the past seven years, he has served as head of school at the Frankel Jewish Academy (FJA) in West Bloomfield, Mich., a multi-denominational high school with 225 students.

In a letter to the Ramaz community, Jacob Doft, Ramaz's chairman of the board, welcomed Rabbi Grossman and cited his "thoughtful and organized management approach, inspiring teaching style and dynamic speaking skills."

The rabbi, an alumnus of York University and Yeshivat HaMivtar in Efrat, received rabbinic ordination from Rabbi Daniel Channan in Jerusalem. His early Jewish education took place at Adath Israel Congregational School, and he joined CHAT's "new stream" program for students who had not previously attended day school.

Rabbi Grossman, whose wife Karynne Naftolin also grew up at Adath Israel and attended CHAT, is still in touch with Sam Kapustin and Gary Levine, two of his high school teachers, whom he credits with inspiring his career path.

As well, York University professor Martin Lockshin has also inspired him and guided his career, he said. Lockshin described Rabbi Grossman, who served as his research assistant in the late 1990s, as "a gifted educator." Rabbi Grossman continues to publish in the field of biblical studies.

Adath Israel's Rabbi Steven Saltzman, who died last September, was another mentor, and the shul's cantor emeritus, Eliezer Kirshblum, Rabbi Grossman's former Hebrew School principal, has also been a role model.

"The greatest gift my parents gave me was taking me to the Adath Israel every Shabbat," said Rabbi Grossman, who became Orthodox while studying at yeshiva in Israel. He has, however, retained a strong connection with his home synagogue, which is Conservative.

Rabbi Grossman said his priorities as head of school stem from a focus on students as well as the school's "mission," which is based on Zionism, American values and Jewish law at both Ramaz and at FJA.

Early last year, Ramaz faced two high-profile issues that were reported on by Jewish media. In January 2014, in response to an announcement by another modern Orthodox high school, Ramaz stated that girls would be allowed to wear tfillin at the school's morning prayers if they wanted to.

A month later, the school revoked a student-initiated invitation to Rashid Khalidi, Columbia University's Edward Said Professor of modern Arab studies, to speak at the school. Students protested the decision in an online petition.

Rabbi Grossman did not comment on those issues at the time, but told The CJN last week that whether an issue is political or religious, it is essential to consider what's best for students and what's consistent with the school's mission. He noted that the rabbis of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun, with which Ramaz is connected institutionally, "are available to help Ramaz navigate these complex issues."

Addressing the high cost of Jewish day school tuition, Rabbi Grossman said that both Ramaz and his current school "are blessed with magnanimous donors... The high cost of day school is driven by the resources needed to hire the best teachers, so the difference must always be made up in financial aid dollars." ■

HELPING CHILDREN

IMPROVING HEALTHCARE

SUPPORTING WOMEN

Daycares

- Provide a safe-haven during the day to a child of working parents. Children receive nutritious hot meals and snacks, ensuring they can focus on learning, playing and growing

Schools

- Give a student the opportunity to prepare for a bright future. CHW schools offer each student a range of educational programs and services designed to meet their specific needs.
- Provide a home away from home for a child at-risk. Children receive counselling in a stimulating, supportive environment. Help them to discover their own unique gifts and give them the support to flourish.
- Help children discover their Jewish identity. Children participate in Bar/Bat Mitzvah classes, the March of the Living program, or school enrichment excursions and special activities.

Youth Clubs

- Create a secure space for children to hang out and have fun, while their parents are at work. Children enjoy recreational activities with their friends, as well as receive tutoring and a wholesome meal.

Summer Camps

- Send a Canadian child to a Jewish summer camp. Open up a world of opportunity as they explore their Jewish roots, make friends, participate in outdoor activities, and discover their hidden talents.

Parental Hotline

- Support a single mother who is concerned about her child. A specially trained volunteer will offer her a listening ear, support and direction, ensuring that both she and her child thrive.

Hospitals

- Help heal a patient who has experienced a stroke. Patients have immediate access to life-saving surgery and a chance for full recovery.
- Provide our healthcare teams with the modern tools needed to perform today's complex surgeries so that patients facing urgent care are never turned away.

Women & Community Centres

- Support a woman who is struggling day-to-day to feed her children She receives guidance and job skills training, empowering her and her family.
- Help families reach their full potential through social programs, recreational activities, and support groups so that they can lead productive, independent lives.

Muslim and Jews unite at Int'l Women's Day event

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

If you take out the accents, the greetings of "shalom aleichem" in Hebrew and "salaam aleikum" in Arabic sound the same.

These expressions of welcome were repeated quite a few times on a sunny Sunday afternoon in North York to mark International Women's Day. Nearly 200 Toronto-area Jews and Muslims came together March 8 at the Borochov Cultural Centre to meet each other and begin a dialogue about helping their communities.

The program, organized by Na'amat Canada and the Canadian Council of Muslim Women, was the first step by the two groups toward merging their networks of women.

"If we don't talk to each other and we don't come together... Islamophobia and anti-Semitism will continue growing," Gerry Anklewicz, president of Na'amat Canada,Toronto, told The CJN. "When you know about the other, then there is no other."

For both Na'amat Canada in Toronto and CCMW's local group, this was the first inter faith event either had held in years. Human rights activist Karen Mock helped Na'amat get in touch with Muslim community leaders, and both sides welcomed the idea.

"If we are united and working together, we're that much more powerful to fight hateful rhetoric and for the equality of women's rights," said Fathima Hussain, president of the CCMW in Toronto.

Aside from interfaith relations, with stories about sexual harassment frequently in the news and ongoing issues with equal wages for women, there were many hot-button topics on participants' minds.

The event brought out girls as young as 10, as well as a few Na'amat volunteers in their 90s. The program took months to plan, and many of the attendees said they were excited to get the chance to speak to women from other cultures.

Half an hour before the event's start, most of the chairs were taken. Some community leaders and dignitaries, including York Centre MP Mark Adler, had to search for seats in the packed room. Not long into the program, it was standing room only.

Before the speeches, some of the younger participants took selfies with new friends at their tables, and it wasn't long before the women were sharing stories across cultures.

The Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims also helped to plan the celebration, along with the Women's Intercultural Network (WIN). WIN honoured Liberal Sen. Mobina Jaffer with an International Women's Day award for her achievements.

WIN also acknowledged Na'amat Canada with the Vara P. Singh Award, a tribute to its volunteer efforts. The women's organization turns 90 this year.

In her keynote address, Jaffer spoke about her dream for all women to be able to obtain education and be free from violence. She also told the women that the value of this initial meeting would be lost if the same Jewish and Muslim women didn't meet again until the next International Women's Day.

"We either look out for each other, or we destroy each other," she said. "We have to work together."

Jaffer, born in Uganda and currently representing British Columbia, is the chair of the Senate standing committee of human rights. She was also Canada's first Muslim senator when she was appointed in 2001 and has championed issues involving gender-based violence and security for women and girls.

Having served as Canada's Special Envoy for Peace in Sudan a decade ago, she spoke about how disheartened she was by the lack of female voices in talks. "I've always felt that I don't want men to make decisions for me," she said. "I need to be at the table."

Jaffer urged guests to engage in powerful discussion and learn from each other's stories and pain. "I truly believe it will be the women who will bring peace between Israel and Palestine," she said. Many greeted that statement with applause. ■

Reform rabbis honoured for 50 years in rabbinate

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Rabbi Jerry Steinberg

Rabbi Michael Stroh

While Rabbi Jerry Steinberg and Rabbi Michael Stroh have had divergent career paths, the two Reform clergy are the sole Canadians being honoured for their 50 years in the rabbinate at this month's 126th annual convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR).

Each year, the CCAR, the principal organization of Reform rabbis in the United States and Canada and the largest and oldest rabbinical organization in the world (it was founded in 1889), celebrates its members who have reached the 50-year mark.

At this year's convention, to be held March 15-18 in Philadelphia, CCAR will recognize 27 member rabbis ordained in 1965. The convention will also feature workshops, speakers and a hands-on social justice project.

"We're very proud, as an organization, to honour these individuals who have served their communities in such unique and meaningful ways," Rabbi Steven Fox, CEO of the CCAR, said in a statement.

Both Rabbi Steinberg, who was born and raised in Regina, and Rabbi Stroh, who is originally from New York City but is a dual American-Canadian citizen, were ordained at the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion – Rabbi Steinberg at the school's Cincinnati campus and Rabbi Stroh at its New York campus.

"I feel great," Rabbi Steinberg, 79 and a resident of Thornhill, said of the honour.

Retired for six years, he continues to work as part-time rabbi at a small synagogue in Ajax, B'nai Shalom v'Tikvah – a post he's held for 12 years.

"It's a great congregation," he said. "I enjoy them, and they enjoy me. It's a shidduch."

Rabbi Steinberg spent 35 years working as a clinical psychotherapist in Toronto, specializing in dreams, past-life regression and psychogenic illnesses.

Following his ordination, he spent two years living in an ashram in the interior of British Columbia exploring yoga and meditation. He subsequently moved to Winnipeg and became founding rabbi of Temple Sholom, where he worked for five years.

Rabbi Steinberg was later hired by the federal government as a consultant in yoga, meditation and altered states of consciousness, subjects he has lectured widely on, often to Jewish groups.

"They had this program called the Non-Medical Use of Drugs Directorate," he explained. "They thought yoga and meditation might help young people stay clear of drugs, so I became the consultant."

He has also taught comparative mysticism and meditation at the University of North Dakota and Jewish history and literature at the University of Manitoba.

"The area of Judaism I relate most to is Kabbalah, which means to receive from, or connect with, God," Rabbi Steinberg said of the link between eastern spiritual practices and Judaism. "The word 'yoga' also means to connect to God."

He authored Melting: Poems of a Frozen Man, published 1992, and Rogue Rabbi: A Spiritual Quest from Seminary to Ashram and Beyond, a memoir published in 2012, and is working on a novel about the interface between sexuality and spirituality.

"I've had an interesting life," he mused.

Rabbi Stroh, 76, moved to Toronto a year after his ordination.

He met the late Heinz Warschauer, the then director of education at Holy Blossom Temple, at a leadership training program in the United States, and Warschauer asked him to join Holy Blossom as an assistant to Rabbi Gunther Plaut.

Rabbi Stroh spent five years at Holy Blossom before helping a group of young congregants moving further north to found Thornhill's first Reform synagogue, Temple Har Zion.

He spent 35 years as spiritual leader of Temple Har Zion, where he established an adult education program, which he described as one of his proudest accomplishments. "People participated (in it) far beyond entry level," he noted.

He continues to teach there, as well as at Holy Blossom.

Rabbi Stroh has, over the years, made substantial contributions to the Reform movement: he chaired the Reform Round Table: A Discussion on the Content of Reform Judaism, under the auspices of the CCAR; he participated in the writing of the New Reform Principles, released in 1999; he founded and was president of the Reform Zionist organization, Arza Canada and he was the past chair of Arzenu: International Federation of Reform and Progressive Religious Zionists.

Raised in a Conservative household, he said he "was drawn to the Reform movement because I felt I could participate in it in an honest way, in terms of what I believe and the kind of movement it is, which is open to different points of view." ■

Ezer Mizion hopes for more Jewish bone marrow donors

SHERI SHEFA
SSHEFA@THECJN.CA

The executive director of Ezer Mizion Canada, a non-profit health organization founded in Israel, hopes that its upcoming fundraising event will raise awareness about the importance of a Jewish bone marrow donor registry.

Raquel Benzacar Savatti, Ezer Mizion Canada's executive director, told The CJN that Canadian Jewish patients in need of a bone marrow transplant are likely to have more difficulty than others finding a match in the Canadian Blood Services Registry because they're under-represented.

"It's a numbers game. That's the bottom line. We know that in Canada we have [fewer than] 400,000 Jews, and of that number... there is really only a certain demographic that is the right age and has good health to be qualified as a potential donor," Savatti explained.

The division head of general and thoracic surgery at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, Dr. Jacob Langer, who is co-chairing the March 22 Benefit for Life event at the Carlu with his wife Ferne, agreed that the issue stems from the fact that Jews are a small minority.

"I would suspect the low numbers [in Canada for Jewish donors] are not because we're less likely to donate. I think it is because there are so few of us," Langer said.

Savatti explained that the likelihood that a patient's sibling will be a match is 25 per cent, but the likelihood that the match will come from someone of the same ethnic background is 99 per cent.

In 1998, Ezer Mizion established its own bone marrow donor registry and today, it's the largest Jewish one and the fourth-largest registry in the world.

Savatti said that in 2009, the Israel Defence Forces agreed to offer its new recruits an opportunity to get swabbed and register with Ezer Mizion as part of the IDF induction process.

"Since then, the registry has grown exponentially. We now have over 750,000 samples of active donors in the registry," Savatti said. "We've got an arsenal of the best - young and healthy potential donors."

Ned Nasi, a Toronto Jewish father to a 21-year-old son who was diagnosed with leukemia in October, understands more than most how important registries like Ezer Mizion are.

After learning that his son would need a bone marrow transplant as part of his treatment and discovering that his other son wasn't a match, he began to search registries around the world.

"We were told that there are two important things that play a role in finding a good match," said Nasi, a Jew who moved to Toronto from Turkey five years ago. "One is genetic background and the other is the geography that you come from. In that case, we had two populations to draw from – one was the Turkish population and one was the Jewish population."

Last month, Nasi was told by his son's doctors that a match had been found, although they weren't able to disclose where it came from.

Langer said Jewish patients are most likely to find a match through Ezer Mizion, and the more Jews that are registered, the higher the chance a Jewish patient can find a life-saving match.

Savatti said the registry offers Jews a safety net.

"If the registry reaches a number of 1.2 million active donors, we would have, potentially, a donor for every Jewish patient in the world," Savatti said.

Ehud Barak will speak at the March 22 event.

But that goal requires money.

"[Processing] each DNA test... costs $65... Just to process all the DNA that we get from the soldiers alone, we need about $3 million a year. We can swab everyone and their uncle. But we need the funds to extract that data to get it into the registry."

The March 22 event, which will feature a keynote address by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak, is a step toward that goal.

Hamilton native wants to live on Mars

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Ben Criger, right, is one of the Mars One project's top 100 candidates, out of 200,000 initial applicants.

For Ben Criger it's a no-brainer: "If somebody says, 'We're leaving for Mars,' you say, 'Yeah, OK.' That's just what you say."

The 28-year-old is one of the top 100 candidates being considered for the Mars One project, run by a Netherlands-based organization that's attempting to form a settlement on the distant Red Planet.

More than 200,000 would-be explorers initially applied to Mars One in 2013 and now, after multiple cuts, the remaining applicants will be whittled down until just 24 individuals remain.

Criger is one of six Canadians still in the running to make a permanent move to Earth's second-closest neighbour in the solar system. The next round of cuts will likely begin later this year or next year.

"Maybe one per cent of the time I'm either excited or horrified," Criger said of his top 100 status.

He's nervous about being a failed reality TV contestant, because part of the process will likely be documented in a reality-television-style broadcast. Mostly, though, he says it doesn't feel much different than when he originally applied.

The Hamilton, Ont., native is currently living in Aachen, Germany, while doing post-doctoral work in theoretical physics and quantum information. Before that, he completed his PhD at the University of Waterloo.

As a physicist, he's excited by the innovative technology he'll be able to use on Mars, largely thanks to its thin atmosphere and gravitational pull, which is 62 per cent less intense than Earth's.

If all goes according to Mars One's plan, four pioneering astronauts will blast off in 2024, with four more joining every two years.

The journey to Mars is predicted to take approximately seven months in extremely tight quarters. Once they land, the colonists will live in an inflatable habitat, where they'll eat, sleep and grow crops.

That is, as Criger said, if they're able to launch the rocket at all. A Mars landing of this magnitude has never been attempted, and many are skeptical about the mission's feasibility.

Since there will be Internet access for the colonists on Mars, Criger thinks he'll feel somewhat connected to home, but he'll miss some its simple pleasures, such as some of the food and coffee.

While there, his diet would be mostly limited to what he and his fellow colonists could grow in the habitat. He predicted that they would grow simple crops such as wheat and soy.

Though not religious, Criger values a work ethic that he believes is rooted in immigration movements, such as the mass Jewish migrations of the early 1900s.

Criger also sees a link between Mars One and the migration waves of the past, though from a communications perspective, he thinks it will be easier to stay connected with family and friends than it was for immigrants in the past.

"We're comparatively going to be in constant contact," he said.

As for his parents, "their feelings are mixed about it," he said.

"You can't expect someone to be completely behind you all the way. They do stand to lose something if I go away forever," he added.

"So they're a little emotional about it. But at the end of the day, they respect what I'm doing. My parents are proud of me, and I couldn't ask for anything more." ■

Dov Altman 'left a legacy of being a mensch'

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Dov Altman often referred to himself as "the luckiest person in the world," his wife, Elana Fleischmann, said.

Altman died Feb. 25 at Toronto General Hospital at age 55. He had suffered from chronic lung rejection following a double lung transplant, which he underwent due to suffering from pulmonary fibrosis.

For the past 13 years, Altman was executive vice-president of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, which raises funds for, and connects Canadians to, the Israeli university.

Deeply passionate about Israel and the Jewish community, at age 41, he left a successful career in commercial property leasing to pursue a path he found more meaningful.

Already actively involved in the community as a lay leader – he was chair of canvasser training and motivation for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2002 campaign and served on the boards of Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation – Altman felt compelled to contribute in a full-time capacity.

"After 9/11, Dov said to me that he just couldn't continue doing commercial leasing," Fleischmann said. "He wasn't passionate about it."

Altman accepted the position at Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan, which Fleischmann said reflected his feeling that quality education is critical to Israel's future.

"He said he felt he was the luckiest person to have that job," she said. "It meant he was able to visit Israel, and nothing made him happier than that."

Gillian Sinclair, current executive director of the Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, said, "Dov had a strong passion for his work.... His greatest joy was being able to talk to people about Bar-Ilan and its contribution to the State of Israel."

Altman's devotion to the Jewish community began at a young age. Born in Toronto, the youngest of four children, Altman attended William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute and, at 15, became a chapter president of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO).

When Altman was 17 and Fleischmann – who was president of her local BBYO chapter in Ottawa – was 16, they met at a Toronto BBYO weekend called the "Beau Ball."

After a logistical mixup caused the Ottawa chapter to miss an event, she and Altman had a "huge fight."

"I yelled at him, and the next week, I wrote him a letter apologizing," she explained. "The rest is history."

The couple married in 1987.

Altman earned a bachelor's degree in political science from York University and got his first job doing property management with the Toronto Harbour Commission. He subsequently did commercial leasing for companies such as Royal LePage and Cadillac Fairview.

Altman was diagnosed with pulmonary fibrosis about nine years ago, but he didn't experience symptoms until 2011. In 2013, he was placed on a lung transplant list, and, though he received a transplant that September, six months later, his health seriously declined.

Even while sick, Fleischmann said, Altman maintained a positive disposition.

"He was always joking, always asking how everyone else was," she said. "He made it his business to find out what all of his nurses names were, his caretakers."

After he passed away, the head of the hospital transplant team wrote her to say that the hospital staff "cared so much about Dov."

Altman's warmth, kindness and generosity were reflected in the way his friends and neighbours rallied around the family, who are longtime members of Adath Israel Congregation, during Altman's sickness, and in the outpouring of responses to his death.

Dov Altman

"There were over 1,000 people at his funeral" Fleischmann said. "Over 500 at the shivah."

She emphasized that Altman's impact on others has been immensely comforting.

"I can't tell you the legacy he left behind. It's not always about how successful you are, but about being a mensch, and the reputation you leave in the world. And boy did Dov leave a legacy of being a mensch."

In addition to his wife, Altman leaves two children, Neal and Jillian. ■

Neil Sedaka to headline Chai Lifeline benefit concert

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Pop music legend Neil Sedaka will be in Toronto next week to entertain audiences on behalf of Chai Lifeline, an international charity organization that provides programming and support to seriously ill children and their families.

Sedaka, whose 50-year-career gave way to classic hits including Calendar Girl, Happy Birthday Sweet Sixteen and Breaking Up Is Hard To Do, will perform for about 2,000 people as part of Chai Lifeline's Sing for the Children benefit on March 16 at Toronto's Roy Thomson Hall.

"What could be better than giving tzedakah and listening to Sedaka?" said comedian Elon Gold, who will act as the event's master of ceremonies.

"[People can] give a little gold while listening to some Gold."

Gold, whose career highlights include a number of appearances on the Tonight Show with Jay Leno, and a Just for Laughs comedy special, said he's been a supporter of Chai Lifeline for the past 10 years.

"The work they do is so amazing, important, touching, meaningful and life-changing. It helps people in ways that you can't imagine, nor do you want to," Gold said.

"The goal of the night is to raise money and awareness and have a good time, and for me, I think music and comedy is the best of both worlds."

Cantor Simon Spiro of Beth Tzedec Congregation, will also perform at the eighth annual concert for Chai Lifeline Canada.

Rabbi Mordechai Rothman, director of the Canadian chapter of the international organization, said the proceeds from the event will maintain and expand its services to Canadian families with children fighting serious pediatric illness.

"This is our largest and most important fundraiser. [It] really keeps our doors open, and it is where we get our core funding of our programming," Rabbi Rothman said, adding that it costs about $1.5 million annually to keep the Canadian offices operating.

"For children who are stricken with cancer, or other lifelong illnesses such as cerebral palsy or muscular dystrophy, we provide a number of services to families as they deal with the diagnosis."

He said in most cases, when a child is diagnosed with cancer, one of the parents is forced to take time off work or quit their job to be available to take the child to doctors appointments and be present for ongoing treatments.

"The Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario estimates that a family's income will go down by as much as a third with a diagnosis of cancer – at a time when there are all kinds of extra financial things that are needed, like medication, parking, and things like that," Rabbi Rothman explained.

"We also take a holistic approach and look at mom and dad, so we'll provide financial support, provide counselling support, support groups, and opportunities to meet other parents who are also dealing with a similar situation."

He said while the organization offers support to the parents, it also provides for the children in the family.

"For the sick child we have big brothers and big sisters. We'll give toys and games and things to the child, and tutoring to keep them up to date with school," he said.

Chai Lifeline also operates a kosher summer camp in upstate New York for children with cancer called Camp Simcha.

"We also look at the siblings... they have to deal with not having mom or dad around like they're used to because mom and dad are focused on the sick child."

At the upcoming concert, Rabbi Rothman said the guests will hear from a young woman who will share her experience as a recipient of Chai Lifeline's services.

But Gold, who has a new comedy special on Netflix called Chosen & Taken, said the evening is focused on entertaining people.

"It's always nice to support an important cause and be entertained at the same time," he said, adding that he's looking forward to performing in Toronto.

"I always love performing in Toronto – I have a lot of friends there – and especially for my people because I get to do material that I can't do at most of my gigs. I'm constantly coming up with new bits, just based on the fact that I live a Jewish life," Gold said. ■

Federation education program shows early success: report

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A Federation CJA program launched in 2012 to make Jewish day school education in Montreal more affordable without putting financial stress on the schools, appears to be having the desired result.

"The early returns are promising," according to an evaluation by the Boston-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), a North American organization that believes day school education is essential to the flourishing of the community. It seeks to make these schools affordable without compromising their quality of education or long-term sustainability.

Federation CJA is one of its partners.

Three years ago, the federation launched the CAPS (Creating Access: Promoting Success) program, backed by $47 million in endowment funding secured by its Generations Fund, in partnership with major donors and the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal.

Aimed at middle-income families, CAPS offers to those eligible a freeze on tuition from kindergarten through Grade 6 and Secondary I through V. On top of that, incentive grants of $1,800 are available for children entering kindergarten or high school.

All seven of the mainstream day schools are participating in CAPS, and more than 650 students are currently benefiting. The deadline for applications for 2015-16 is April 3.

This is above the 3,000 students, generally from lower-income families, who receive support from the federation's long-running Tuition Assistance Allocation program.

Harry Bloom, PEJE's strategy manager for financial sustainability, lauded Montreal's approach for finding the right balance between accessibility and ensuring the schools' quality and viability.

"Montreal's feeder grades [kindergarten and Secondary I] are filling up quickly, and the middle income and incentive grants are cited in parent research as key factors in new enrolment," he says. "The number of middle-income, full-paying families in the day school system is increasing."

Parents' perception of how good the schools are is also rising, as is school fundraising, he found.

Natana Shek-Dor, director of the Generations Fund, said the fund pays the schools the full difference between the tuition freeze and the actual cost of tuition up to six per cent per year, thereby allowing the schools to maintain or improve standards.

She told The CJN that receiving PEJE's "stamp of approval is gratifying...but even more gratifying is seeing the schools get stronger."

CAPS
access:promotingsuccess

Shek-Dor said the CAPS approach is more "holistic" than simply making day school education less expensive.

"The bottom line is we are ensuring that a broader range of people have access and that the day school system is excellent. Families are able to project what the education will cost over multiple years, and the schools have the safety net that allows them to raise tuition on an annual basis thereby ensuring their quality and keeping them competitive with any of the best options out there – with the added bonus of being Jewish."

Monica Mendel Bensoussan, president of Talmud Torah/Herzliah High School, one of the participating schools, said, "Thanks to CAPS, our school community can focus on excellence in its annual budgetary process. Most families who are accepted have security in knowing that tuition is capped for the duration of their children's stay.

"Board discussions surrounding tuition increases are centred around strategic priorities instead of how much of an increase our parent body, particularly middle-income families, can tolerate."

Bloom also praised the "excellence" grants to schools managed by the federation's Bronfman Jewish Education Centre. This money enables schools to "invest in top-notch people such as heads of school, development directors, admission directors and marketing directors.

"The Generations Fund has allowed schools to search for and mentor new hires in these key positions because it believes that by 'getting the right people on the bus'...academic excellence and sustainability-enhancing programs and processes will result."

He notes that these are not "no strings attached" handouts; recipients must account for success or failure in achieving the outcomes set.

Funding is also available for educational leaders to participate in various "capacity-building" programs run by PEJE.

"Surely there will be bumps in the road in the Montreal community and school partners' pursuit of the trifecta of excellence, sustainability and affordability, but it seems like a model that should be a beacon for other communities to follow," Bloom concludes. ■

Hebrew U, dragon boaters raise funds for autism research

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Hebrew University is partnering with Dragon Boat Israel (DBI), a Canadian-Israeli fundraising initiative that brings the sport of dragon boat racing to Israel while raising money for autism research.

Although this is the first time Hebrew U has partnered with DBI, the May 28-29 festival, to be held on Israel's Sea of Galilee, is the third event of its kind.

Debbie Halton-Weiss, DBI's founder and chair, explained that for the first two festivals, held in 2012 and 2013, the events raised money for Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA and combined raised about $150,000.

She said Jewish, Christian, Muslim and Druze participants come together from all over the world to form 40 teams and take part in a 300-metre race off the shores of the Sea of Galilee, also known as Lake Kinneret.

After two successful events in 2012 and 2013, Halton-Weiss said DBI worked to establish a "sustainable" fundraising partner.

"We invested a lot of money in bringing top expertise, consultants, to steer people to Israel to do the festival and in 2014 we felt that would be a great time to have the Israelis take more leadership in the festival," Halton-Weiss said.

She said she approached Shelli Kimmel, director of the Ottawa chapter of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, who has also volunteered with DBI since its inception, about the possibility of partnering with Hebrew U.

"When it was presented to the executives of Dragon Boat Israel, it spoke to a lot of the people who were in the room, and they felt it was something they felt they could hang their hats on in terms of reaching out to people for sponsorship and raising money for," Kimmel said.

She said at an institution like Hebrew U, there were so many worthy causes to raise money for, but they decided on raising money for autism research and hope to develop an autism centre at the school.

"It would be a multidisciplinary centre in terms of the research being done, but also for those who want to work with children... and want to be able to go out into the under-serviced communities of Israel in the periphery," Kimmel explained.

"It's easier to get services you need for anything if you're in one of the major cities. Their goal is to try to reach the under-serviced communities, the minority populations, immigrant populations, people in the periphery of the country."

Halton-Weiss said she was also happy about the decision to raise money for autism.

"We wanted something research-based but we also wanted something clinically based and we thought the autism piece was a great fit," she said.

Halton-Weiss said that in the short time since dragon boating was introduced to Israel, Israelis have really embraced it and have used the boats for events outside of the festival.

"There is a breast cancer survivor team, a blind team. Degania Beit is a kibbutz team. They were having some issues around their old membership and their new membership, and they used dragon boating as a team-building exercise to bring the old members in with the new, and found it was really successful," she said.

"One team, the Ohalo Dolphins are a team that won the 2013 festival we held. They went on to compete in Italy at the world championship representing Israel using our messaging of diversity and inclusivity. They were a team of Jews, Christians, Arabs, Bedouins, men, women, all sizes, all shapes, and they raised their own money to get to Italy and represented Israel, and they were brought to the starting line with a big Israeli flag and a big hooray, saying this is the Israeli team bringing in a little bit of peace into the world."

As for the upcoming festival in May, DBI and CFHU are currently registering teams who are required to raise funds to participate in the race.

"We have different faculties from Hebrew U coming on board, including the law faculty and the medical faculty, and we're trying to create a little competition among the faculties," Halton-Weiss said. ■

Hundreds attend first Limmud Toronto event since 2009

SHERI SHEFA
SSHEFA@THECJN.CA

In the first such event in six years, hundreds of people gathered March 8 to take part in Limmud Toronto 2015, an international Jewish learning festival that promotes Judaism's rich history, culture, and heritage.

Limmud Toronto, which was founded in 2007 by a U.K.-born volunteer named Peter Sevitt and modelled after Britain's 30-year-old Limmud educators' conference attended by about 2,500 people annually, was held at the Alliance Francaise Toronto.

About 85 rabbis, professors and community leaders, spoke on topics relevant to Toronto's young professionals, including art, music, the Bible and Talmud, Israel, health, Jewish history, Jewish identity and education, Jewish values and philosophy, social activism and politics, and literature.

In one of the sessions, Rabbi Aviva Richman, a Talmud teacher at the New York-based yeshiva Mechon Hadar, led a discussion titled "The Talmud Meets the Vagina Monologues."

She said she wanted to explore the Talmud with a feminist lens and used excerpts from Eve Ensler's Vagina Monologues – an episodic play that features monologues relating to the female experience of sex, menstruation, masturbation, birth and orgasm – to serve as commentary on talmudic passages that relate to sexuality.

"I thought maybe a less vulnerable way to bring women's voices into the Talmud is to use these monologues as commentary to the Talmud passages," Rabbi Richman explained.

"What would happen if you took the Talmud and either instead of, or in addition to having Rashi in the margins, have some of the scripts from the Vagina Monologues on the margins that kind of interrupt the talmudic texts and comment and go back and forth?"

She said approaching talmudic texts in this way is not about saying "the Talmud is wrong about this, and the modern women's voice needs to come in and make it right… I'm more interested in creating a conversation about female sexuality that is springing from the Talmud."

Another session led by Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of education and counselling for Jews for Judaism Canada, explored some of the negative stereotypes that people have about religion in general and how Judaism suffers from it.

In his lecture titled "Is Religion Killing Judaism?" Rabbi Skobac said he doesn't often meet Jews who reject Judaism.

Rabbi Aviva Richman leads a session titled "The Talmud Meets the Vagina Monologues."

"Often what they are rejecting is a sad and unfortunate caricature of Judaism," he said. "People have… a rather negative association with the idea of religion. It is not a sexy word for many people. It often conjures up negative associations, and I think if we associate Judaism as a religion, I believe it is damaging to our impressions of Judaism."

He said he often hears non-religious people refer to religion as the "opium of the masses," a term coined by Karl Marx, something people use as a crutch if they are lost or have experienced trauma.

"I suspect that many people see religion as something that will cramp my style and make me miserable, interfere with my freedom – it's just dos and don'ts," he said.

"How many people think about Shabbat as 25 hours of torture when you can't do anything? That is how people might frame it, as opposed to seeing Shabbat as a day of liberation where we are often freed from those things that enslave us. It depends how you look at it."

As a ba'al tshuvah who once rejected organized religion, Rabbi Skobac said Jews have a responsibility to make the world a better place. What's missing is "buy-in" from the Jewish People.

"I don't think we're going to be able to fulfil any kind of historical role in this world unless we have a buy-in from the Jewish nation," he said "If we're living in a world, where quite possibly a majority of Jews are not plugged into the ideals of Judaism, it is tough for us to make an impact as a people."

Limmud organizers have already booked next year's festival. The goal is that within three years, Limmud Toronto will host an annual three-day conference. ■

Politics at its very core is a concession to weakness. We, the people, are not able to govern our own behaviours and so we choose to give away some of our power to others who will rule over us. We are thus admitting that the very basis for political power and authority is rooted in understanding that our freedom and our power are a zero-sum game. The more power we give away the less power we have.

If Israeli society can come out of these elections with a renewed sense of energy and optimism, it could be because they will focus not on politics and power, but on another realm altogether – society as the arena of co-operation.

Israelis today are in a position where civic society is in great need of help. Caring for ethnic minorities, championing the cause of the poor and continuing the journey to where those to my political right or my political left are not seen as the enemy, as the incomprehensible other.

Instead, a post-election opportunity could be for Israelis to realize just how much room there is for co-operation and collaboration with each other. As we recently heard in Congress – We're mishpachah. ■

RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL
Spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto

Although the Israeli election initially appeared to be a Seinfeld-Shakespeare collaboration with much ado about nothing, it quickly morphed into a referendum about Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. After almost 10 years in office, Netanyahu owns both the progress and the problems of the country.

The spectacular growth of the high-tech sector was unleashed by Netanyahu's policies. So were the economic and social challenges of the many people left behind. The relative quiet in the Palestinian community as well as the inability to move from stasis to a viable two-state solution sit at his doorstep. The general security of Israel, along with the attacks from tunnels and missiles, were also attributed to him. International respect for Israel and popular alienation throughout Europe were placed on his shoulders.

And there was Iran. The Speech became the focus of media attention. With one dramatic example of strength, Netanyahu shifted voter attention away from his weaknesses. Will it be enough?

After the vote, the "other campaign" will begin. Will the new president entrust Netanyahu with the responsibility of forming a government or will Reuven Rivlin turn to the Zionist Union and other parties? What will the enhanced status of the Arab political base mean? Will the new haredi parties push hard to repeal the law requiring yeshiva students to enter the military? What will the new parties accept in order to enter the government? Stay tuned. ■

JEAN M. GERBER
Consultant in community planning and program assessment in Vancouver

Israel today is at a critical juncture. For Israel's sake, I would hope a new government would undertake the following: an immediate stop to settlements in the occupied territories; a phased reduction in their financial support; a serious effort (without ineffectual U.S. hovering) to reach an agreement with the Palestinian Authority in the West Bank; phased-out support for haredi yeshivas until they include full secular studies; increased support for the Tali school system; increased, not decreased, study of Jewish history and sources in the secular system.

Should a new government be formed with the same jumble of parties, each with its own demanding agenda, none of these changes will take place and the internal health of the nation will continue to decline, as the various sectors draw further into their own fiefdoms, suspicious and angry with each other.

For the Diaspora, bewildered as to how to react, the outlook is bleak. The organized community will support whatever government is in power (warts and all) while a growing segment of Diaspora Jews will simply disengage from what they cannot understand, let alone support uncritically.

A politician tells you what you want to hear. A true friend tells you what you should hear. ■

Rabbinic wisdom has it that after the last biblical prophets, the gift of prophecy was taken from sages and given to fools, as illustrated by the reflections below.

Democracies benefit from a change of government, sometimes even when it's not for the better. That's one reason why I'd like to see Isaac Herzog-Tzipi Livni of the Zionist Camp in the saddle. An even more important reason is that they are more likely to address the burning issues of the day – not only Iran and defence.

These include (a) the growing gap between rich and poor, reflected in the price of housing and caused in part by the obsession with settlement construction, and (b) the lack of progress in peace-making with the Palestinians: it's too convenient and grossly misleading only to blame the other side.

My fear, however, is that we'll have an even more intransigent coalition that may include rabidly right-wing parties and thus endanger the future of Israel.

My compromise hope is a so-called national unity government, preferably with Herzog as prime minister and Netanyahu as minister of finance or minister of defence, but even with Netanyahu as prime minister, Livni as foreign minister and Herzog in finance or social welfare. ■

RABBI HOWARD MORRISON
Spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto

One of my favourite narratives from the Talmud explains a difference between the schools of Hillel and Shammai. While the school of Shammai would articulate its view clearly, the school of Hillel did something far different. It would first state the case made by the school of Shammai with accuracy and respect, then it would articulate its position. One of the reasons Jewish law follows Hillel in most of the famous Hillel-Shammai debates is due to the respect and care Hillel had for its rival.

Last week, I witnessed much discord over Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit to the U.S. Congress. The discord was so loud, I was concerned about internal Jewish unity. Hillel's articulation defines Jewish unity at its best. As one explores the ideologies of different parties in Israel, one can recognize the passion and commitment that each has for its people and its land.

After the election, world Jewry will need to support Israel's democratically elected leadership. I hope and pray world Jewry will demonstrate the kind of unity taught to us by Hillel, that we are one people, regardless of our passionate disagreements.

While we may hold fast to our innermost beliefs and convictions, can we also articulate with respect and care the passionate view of someone with whom we disagree? ■

MICHAEL TAUBE
Political columnist and former speechwriter for Prime Minister Stephen Harper

Making political predictions is a mug's game. Then again, it's never stopped me before!

Israel's upcoming legislative election will be close. The historical trend of forming a coalition government in the Knesset will surely continue.

It's no secret who I want to win.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Likud are the most effective representatives of modern conservative ideas. They firmly support a free market economy and private enterprise. Meanwhile, their strong, no-nonsense position for Israel's safety and security is exactly what's needed.

Although Likud's popularity numbers have fluctuated, and the left-leaning Zionist Union between Labor and Hatnua has gained traction, my sense is voters will maintain the status quo. Netanyahu will cobble together a working agreement with right-leaning religious parties, and remain in office.

The future Israeli government's next political corruption – how will Israelis react on March 17?

steps will be replete with political landmines. Potential military threats from Iran and Syria are top of mind. Hezbollah and Hamas remain problematic. ISIS looms in the background. And, there's that little issue with icy U.S.-Israel relations to deal with.

One thing is for sure. No matter who wins on March 17, it'll be a thankless task. My hope is it stays within Netanyahu's firm grip. ■

GIL TROY
History professor at McGill University in Montreal

There are two different ways of framing the upcoming Israeli election. Many Israelis can't live with him: they are fed up with Benjamin Netanyahu's political game playing, his inaction domestically, his – and now Israel's – disastrous standing internationally. Others can't live without him, fearing a weak, temporizing Isaac Herzog who has promised to alternate with the broadly unpopular yet grudgingly respected Tzipi Livni. Israelis, then, will face the democratic dilemma of voting their hopes or voting their fears.

Israelis also will face the peculiar Israeli dilemma stemming from their complicated electoral system: do they vote for their favourite candidate or do they have some coalition-shaping strategy? The polls suggest that while the Herzog-Livni Zionist Camp has a good chance of winning more votes than Netanyahu's Likud, the coalition math is sobering. As a result, an organization like V-15 just emphasizes the Anybody But Bibi push, while the new Kulanu party emphasizes its centring role regardless of who wins, pushing a Likud coalition left and a Herzog coalition right.

Ultimately, we can confidently predict two election-day outcomes. First, it will be peaceful, as all Israel's democratic election days have been. And second, whoever wins, Israelis will worry, complain, grumble – yet survive. ■

DAVID J. CAPE
Chair of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs

As the advocacy agent of Canada's Jewish federations, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' (CIJA) mandate is to advance the policy interests of the affiliated Jewish community. We try to reflect the broadest community consensus and demonstrate a unity of purpose. Because we are non-partisan, we are not beholden to any political label, affiliation or ideology. Our operating ethos is "unity not uniformity," and it is through this lens that we view the Israeli election.

We think it is neither helpful nor appropriate for CIJA to predict the shape of the next Knesset. As for the options facing voters, we express no preferences. We trust Israeli democracy to reflect the aspirations of its citizens as it has for more than six decades.

The only hope we would articulate is for the next Knesset is to embody a maximum degree of unity and representation within Israeli politics, with every segment of Israeli society feeling that its voice is being heard and its needs are being addressed by the state. Given the extraordinary challenges facing Israelis – security threats, economic constraints, religious-secular reconciliation and accommodation, and issues of social justice, unity may be the best message Israeli voters can send to their leadership. ■

MIRA SUCHAROV
Associate professor of political science at Carleton University, Ottawa

With polls revealing a near dead heat between Likud and the Zionist Union, the devil will be in the coalition details. With a maximum of 24 seats projected for either slate, the winner will have to more than double its own weight with coalition partners. And this means that the Zionist Union will have to reach rightward. That, in turn, will lead the leaders-elect to have to select from potential coalition members who are hostile to one another. It also means a smaller likelihood for significant movement on the peace process. The Joint Arab List stands to gain electorally, but has stated its refusal to partner with a Zionist coalition government. All this points to the likelihood that the Likud will be asked to form the next government.

If elections indeed bring more of the same, those of us who were holding our breath hoping for movement toward peace will be forced to exhale into a continued status quo. While we might say that in democracies, the people get the government they deserve, we must not forget that the Palestinians under occupation shouldn't be subject to any government of a country of which they are not citizens. ■

JAY KELMAN
Founder of Torah in Motion and a teacher at TanenbaumCHAT in Toronto

The only think certain about an Israeli election is that there will be at least one major surprise. What is most needed is a strong government not beholden to the often narrow interests of parties that focus on only one or two issues.

We need a government that with a full term will have the strength, wisdom and time to tackle the main social and economic issues facing Israel, such as the unaffordability of housing, the much-too-wide income gap between rich and poor, and the integration of haredim into the workplace (and maybe even the army). I would love to see the rhetoric toned down as people appreciate that most of those with opposing views have the best interests of the Jewish People at heart – even if they have a very different view of what those best interests are. Unfortunately, it appears that peace is as far away as possible and management, not solution, of the conflict is all we can hope for at present.

Being that I'm writing this on Purim, let's have some fun and predict the following seat count: Likud 26, Zionist Union 23, Bayit Yehudi 14, Yesh Atid 13, Joint Arab List 12, Kahalon 10, Shas 6, United Torah 7, Meretz 4. ■

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
Spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation

Although current polls favour Benjamin Netanyahu to be prime minister again, the one thing you can be sure of in Israeli politics is that nothing is for sure.

Bibi lost the prime ministership in 1999 (to Ehud Barak) largely for socioeconomic reasons in Israel, a factor with which Diaspora Jewry is unacquainted. Furthermore, it's been suggested that Netanyahu lost because a strong U.S. president, Bill Clinton, wasn't fond of his Israeli counterpart, and may have played a role in getting him ousted.

Despite Netanyahu's popularity with the U.S. Congress and much of the United States and Canada, it's clear that U.S. President Barack Obama isn't exactly enamoured with him, especially not after his speech to Congress. While a strong prime minister who is tough on security – especially Iran – and is a tough negotiator with the Palestinians is what Israel appears to need right now, the future for Israel's leader is as obscure as ever.

Watching Netanyahu address Congress and invoke the story of Esther at the beginning of his speech and Moses' parting words of "be strong and resolute" at the end filled me with great pride and emotion. I pray his words meet their mark. ■

MICHAEL MOSTYN
CEO of B'nai Brith Canada

As Jews living in the Diaspora, Israeli politics are of great interest. While we're fortunate to live in a country that has such strong political support for Israel, we nonetheless tend to find ourselves reflecting on the safety and security of our spiritual and ancestral homeland.

Canadian Jews want to see Iran prevented from acquiring weapons capability.

The regime in Tehran is virulently anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist and a serial violator of human rights – a government that should not be trusted with the bomb. Iran's ongoing support for terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas and its expanding influence may also provide the next prime minister an opportunity to dialogue with neighbouring Arab states that share regional concerns.

Additionally, Diaspora Jewry is troubled by the increased lawfare directed at the Jewish state as the Palestinian Authority is seeking to prosecute Israel at the International Criminal Court (ICC) and has ceased security co-operation with Israel.

We occasionally forget that to the average Israeli, these issues are sometimes secondary. Key domestic matters in this election have been affordable housing, the economy and government transparency.

While Israeli voters will cast their ballot for the party they feel best reflects their stand on major issues, we in the Diaspora would like to see the next government stand strong in the face of the major external challenges and security issues facing the country. ■

Creation of Palestinian state irrelevant, Netanyahu says

Prime minister backs away from speech of 2009, in which he expressed support for two state solution

TIMES OF ISRAEL STAFF
JERUSALEM

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that the creation of a Palestinian state, a move that he supported in a famous speech at Bar-Ilan University in 2009, was no longer relevant in the current reality in the Middle East.

"In the Mideast today, any evacuated territory will be overtaken by radical Islam and terror groups backed by Iran. Therefore, there will be no withdrawals and no concessions. It's just not relevant," a statement released by the Likud party on March 8 read, attributing the remark to Netanyahu.

The statement came after the Olam Katan newsletter, distributed in synagogues on Friday nights, published a Q&A with the Likud and other parties in which one of Likud's remarks was that the policies expressed in the Bar-Ilan speech "have been annulled."

"Netanyahu's entire political biography is the struggle against the establishment of the Palestinian state," the party said. Haaretz reported that Likud MK Tzipi Hotovely, a proponent of annexing the West Bank, had answered the question.

Meretz party leader Zahava Gal-on decried the statement, posting on Facebook: "So here, for those who doubted, this is the truth about our prime minister. This is what he really thinks about the two-state solution, this is what the draft proposal revealed this week is worth... this is what can be achieved by a Likud coalition: lies, procrastination, biding time, and more lies."

Gal-on slammed the "two-faced prime minister who is bringing upon us a binational state with his bare hands."

Netanyahu and the Likud's repudiation of what was a declared policy came several days after Yedioth Ahronoth published a document reportedly drafted by Israeli officials outlining Netanyahu's alleged concessions to the Palestinians, alluded to in Gal-on's statement.

According to the document, Netanyahu agreed to negotiate a peace deal on the basis of the 1967 borders, with land swaps; to acknowledge Palestinian aspirations in East Jerusalem; to evacuate settlers from the West Bank; and to allow those who so choose to remain under Palestinian rule.

The publication rattled the Likud party and drew harsh criticisms from politicians to the right of Netanyahu, including Yisrael Beytenu head Avigdor Liberman and Jewish Home leader Naftali Bennett.

Two Likud members, Benny Begin and Knesset Speaker Yuli Edelstein, said the document was fabricated and the publication of it was meant to harm the Likud.

Netanyahu's former national security adviser Yaakov Amidror suggested on Sunday that if the document was leaked by Washington – as had been suggested – it would undermine the possibility of future U.S.-brokered talks.

"There is no doubt that this leak radically impairs the possibility of serious negotiations in the future," Amidror told the Walla news website.

"It doesn't matter who will be the next prime minister – Benjamin Netanyahu or Isaac Herzog – he will not be able to rely 100 per cent on the confidentiality of the negotiations after a leak like this. The same is true for the Palestinians, who will ask themselves, 'We will agree to all these ideas, and then read about it in the papers?' For us, the damage is only political, but on the Palestinian side, it could cost lives," continued Amidror.

"Whoever leaked this caused severe damage to the process, because neither side will be able to rely on the American administration any longer," he added.

Amidror insisted that the document did not accurately represent Netanyahu's position, but was rather an American draft proposal that "was meant to be bad enough for both sides so they could say they had reservations, without telling the Americans to 'Go to hell.'"

"There is no Israeli-Palestinian agreement here, only an American attempt to create a draft that will allow both sides to go to the negotiating room and talk," he said. ■

Thousands protest against government

JTA
JERUSALEM

Tens of thousands of Israelis gathered in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square after Shabbat on March 7 calling for a change in the government.

"Israel Wants Change," as the anti-Netanyahu rally was titled, attracted up to 40,000 people. The event was organized by the One Million Hands movement, a grassroots campaign against right-wing political parties in Israel that calls for a focus on socio-economic issues.

"Israel is surrounded by enemies. Enemies do not scare me. I worry about our leadership," former Mossad chief Meir Dagan told the crowd. "I am afraid of our leadership. I am afraid of a loss of determination, of a loss of personal example. I am afraid of hesitancy and stalemate, and I am afraid above all of the crisis of leadership, a leadership crisis that is the most severe ever here."

Dagan accused Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of "dragging us down to a binational state and to the end of the Zionist dream."

Two nights earlier, Dagan in an interview on Israeli television slammed Netanyahu and Jewish Home party head Naftali Bennett for policies stirring problems with the Palestinians and the Unites States.

Other rally speakers included Michal Kastan Keidar, the widow of an officer killed in last summer's Gaza military operation, and Amiram Levin, a former commander of the IDF's Northern Command and ex-deputy Mossad chief.

Keidar accused Netanyahu of being more concerned with Iran than the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

A pro-Netanyahu rally is scheduled for the same venue on March 14, three days before Israel's national election. ■

OPINION

Next Knesset will be sullied by two ignominious personalities

Yair Lootsteen

Here in Israel we are less than a week before another round of elections and if polls are right, there's nothing much to look forward to. More of the same or even worse.

Seeing as the Babylonian Talmud teaches that "prophesy is given to fools," I won't give you my forecast of how bad things will really turn out.

I will, however, venture to predict that the next Knesset will be sullied by the presence of two ignominious personalities – one new in this arena, the other continuing. While Baruch Marzel and Hanin Zoabi could not be more further apart in their world views, our parliament would be better off with neither of them.

Whether as a symbol of the strength of Israel's democracy, rather than its weaknesses – I'll let you decide - our Supreme Court recently overturned decisions disqualifying their candidacies.

Born in Boston, Marzel grew up in Israel and lives with his family in Tel Rumeida, one of Hebron's Jewish enclaves. An ultra-nationalist, he was a prominent supporter of Rabbi Meir Kahane. Anti-LGBT and anti Jewish-Arab intermarriage, he and his cohorts are regular fixtures demonstrating against Jerusalem's annual gay pride parade and at celebrations of mixed marriages.

Last May, he demonstrated against Pope Francis' visit to Mount Zion and every year he celebrates the actions of another American-born Baruch, Baruch Goldstein, who massacred 29 Muslim worshipers in the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron during Purim 1994. He supports deporting all disloyal Arabs from all parts of the Land of Israel, including the West Bank and Gaza.

Marzel will get into the Knesset having teamed up with Eli Yishai, who broke off from the Sephardi ultra-Orthodox Shas Party because of infighting within that party since its spiritual leader, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, died in 2013. Marzel is a blemish on Yishai and on his new party, and he will bring nothing but dishonour and disgrace to the already not so hallowed halls of the Knesset.

Much to his chagrin, he will be joined in those failures by Zoabi, who's well ensconced in the middle of the new united list representing all three major Arab parties.

Zoabi, a Muslim native of Nazareth, has been an MK since 2009, representing the Balad Party. Balad believes Israel should cease being a Jewish state, to be replaced by one that is binational and democratic in nature. In that vein, she exits Knesset chambers during any singing of Hatikvah, stating this is neither her anthem nor her hope.

In 2010 she achieved particular notoriety upon joining the flotilla of Turkish ships trying to break Israel's blockade of Gaza. She was on board the Mavi Marmara when Israeli naval commandos stormed that ship and during the ensuing violence which left nine passengers dead.

Last July, soon after Palestinians kidnapped three Israeli teenagers hitchhiking in Gush Etzion, south of Jerusalem, (and before it was known they'd been killed) Zoabi expressed understanding for the kidnappers, stating: "Is it strange that people living under occupation and living impossible lives, in a situation where Israel kidnaps new prisoners every day, is it strange that they kidnap? They are not terrorists. Even if I do not agree with them, they are people who do not see any way to change their reality, and they are compelled to use means like these."

Zoabi is much less concerned with the risk of Iran attaining nuclear weapon capabilities than with the existing risk of Israel wielding such capabilities.

Both Marzel and Zoabi are firebrands who'll add more colour to the Knesset than any true content; they'll use their parliamentary immunity to do more damage than any sort of benefit.

While freedom of expression is a cornerstone of any democracy, democracies must protect themselves from misuse of such freedoms. The next Knesset should legislate airtight provisions ensuring Marzel and Zoabi and those similar to them won't get into parliament next time round. ■

Cambridge debating students say Israel is a rogue state

ALEX DAVIS
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, LONDON

Students at England's prestigious University of Cambridge voted last week overwhelmingly in favour of the motion "This House Believes Israel is a Rogue State"during a debate at the Cambridge Union Society.

In a packed debating chamber, 51 per cent of attendees voted in favour of the motion, 30 per cent abstained and 19 per cent voted in opposition.

The debate featured six prominent speakers, most notably the Jewish American political scientist Norman Finkelstein in proposition (for the motion), and Vivian Wineman, the president of the board of deputies of British Jews, in opposition.

Finkelstein was joined by the Palestinian academic, Prof. Ghada Karmi, and the human rights activist Ben White in proposition. Wineman was supported by Hannah Weisfeld, director of the pro-Israel pro-peace movement Yachad, and Davis Lewin, deputy director of the global think tank the Henry Jackson Society.

The proposition opened the debate by focusing on Israeli settlement growth in occupied Palestinian territories since 1967, which White labelled a "grave violation of international law. Karmi further argued that "Israel's preferred methods are violence, aggression and war" and described the state as a "threat to its neighbours."

Wineman, tried to place the state in the wider context of the Middle East and received loud hisses upon declaring Israel as the "only democracy in the Middle East." Wineman additionally provided a passionate rebuttal to the point on settlements, accusing White of obscuring the fact that Israel has withdrawn from settlements in the past in attempts to broker for peace.

Weisfeld chose a different tact, focusing closely on Israeli domestic politics. She argued that any nation with a strong system of parliamentary democracy that allows open criticism, along with a free press, cannot be called rogue.

Despite heated early exchanges between speakers, students remained largely respectful and listened carefully to points raised.

However, the final speaker in opposition, Lewis, was met with vocal abuse, including boos and hisses throughout his speech. This began after Lewis described the motion as "disgusting" and expressed his frustration that Israel was "once again" being debated because of an "obsession" with the state. The loudest jeers of the night came when he dismissed Palestinian death tolls as "minor" by comparison to the hundreds of thousands of casualties of the Syrian civil war.

Union Society president Amy Gregg was repeatedly forced to plea for calm, especially when the debating chamber erupted after Lewis described the Israel Defence Forces as the "most moral army in the world."

"We will review the debate footage, but as the disturbances were general audience noise, rather than repeated incursions by an identifiable individual, we do not anticipate taking disciplinary action," Gregg said after the event.

She denied that Israel was being unfairly focused on, stating: "This is the first debate we have held on Israel in two years. In the meantime, we have discussed Russia, Iran and the Arab Spring, to name but a few of our debate subjects.

"The Israel-Palestine conflict is a topical issue that, as evidenced by turnout, our members are extremely interested in, and this is a primary consideration in deciding which debates to run."

Nevertheless, some Jewish students felt uncomfortable and intimidated by interruptions, which culminated in chants of "Free Palestine, Free Palestine" at the end of the debate.

One student commented, "I felt the debate in general was poorly managed, with little intervention from the president or officials when it became out of hand and hostile – even to the point where we could not hear the speaker. It became extremely chaotic."

The controversial result comes just months after the Israeli ambassador to the United Kingdom was met with loud protests as he addressed students in the Union Society chamber. In addition, a recent survey found Israel to be the second-most disliked country by Britons in the world, behind only North Korea. This follows a significant surge in anti-Israeli sentiment in 2014 across Britain, something Cambridge students appear far from rejecting.

Founded in 1815, the Cambridge union is the world's oldest continuously running debating society. Notable past speakers have included Winston Churchill and Ronald Reagan, as well as the Dalai Lama and Moammar Gadhafi. The society prides itself on debating a wide variety of controversial topics ranging from legalizing the sex industry to capitalism's influence on the Third World.

The same motion was debated at the Cambridge Union in 2010, but was comfortably rejected by a significant majority. Just five years on, it appears Britain's brightest students have had a clear change of heart toward the Jewish state. ■

Proposed Iran agreement not limited to 10 years, U.S. official says

JTA
JERUSALEM

The proposed nuclear agreement with Iran will not be limited to a decade, a senior U.S. official said.

On March 8, the unnamed official who briefed Israeli journalists by phone said the deal would include several phases and last for longer than a decade, according to Israeli media reports. The official added that the world powers negotiating with Iran are "not rushing" to reach a deal.

Still, the United States plans to achieve its goal of reaching the outline of an agreement by the end of March, the official said, with the deal signed three months later.

The world powers, the official said, are working for "the right deal and we're not rushing. We want a political agreement and we want the right agreement without having time pressures." Also, the official said, the world powers "will not allow Iran to go nuclear."

"We can reach a long-term agreement that will distance Iran from a nuclear weapon, an agreement that will last more than a decade, an agreement that will be better than a military strike," the official said.

In an interview broadcast Sunday on Face the Nation, U.S. President Barack Obama said the world powers have offered Iran an "extraordinarily reasonable deal," but that gaps between the two sides remain.

Obama said that Iran must be willing to "accept the kind of verification and constraints on their program that so far, at least, they have not been willing to say yes to."

He also said that the United States and the world powers would "walk away" rather than accept a bad deal.

"If we cannot verify that they are not going to obtain a nuclear weapon, that there's a breakout period so that even if they cheated we would be able to have enough time to take action, if we don't have that kind of deal, then we're not going to take it," Obama said.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in an address last week before a joint session of Congress called the current outline a "bad deal" and said the lawmakers should reject it. ■

Interfaith musical ensemble brings its message to Toronto

sshefa@thecjn.ca

For the past 10 years, Israel's Diwan Saz Interfaith Ensemble has used its music to promote peace, harmony and coexistence. The group brings its message to Toronto this week as part of the second annual Spotlight on Israeli Culture.

The two-month showcase that runs until March 23 features the best of Israeli music, theatre, film, dance and visual arts, and brings together a number of local organizations that work to promote Israeli culture.

One of those organizations is the Ashkenaz Foundation, which hosts an interfaith panel discussion titled "Music and the Arts: A Bridge to Peace," March 11, at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre in Vaughan, Ont.

Using the work of Diwan Saz as an example, a panel of artists and community leaders explores how music, art and culture can bridge communities all around the world.

The following night, on March 12, the multicultural group Diwan Saz, made up of Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Bedouin musicians who perform ancient music from Central Asia, Turkey, Persia and Israel, will perform at Toronto's Aga Khan Museum.

Speaking from his home in the Galilee, 39-year-old Yochai Barak, the group's founder and musical director, told The CJN that when the group first formed 10 years ago, he had no idea what it would become.

"It is totally different today. It started just for the sake of playing music with some very advanced students of mine, and musician friends," said Barak, who teaches at a music school in Jerusalem called the Center for Middle Eastern Classical Music.

"After a few years, it evolved so that the best musicians in Israel came and joined us. Also, we live in the northern Galilee next to Nazareth and we're surrounded by Christian and Muslim and Jewish villages, so from all over they came, and it became not only about music, but a dialogue."

The band members are Barak, who plays the saz and baglama; Udi Ben-knaan on the lyre and saz; percussionist Eyal Luman; Amir Shahsar, the Persian vocalist and nay player; Lubna Salame, the Arabic vocalist; Tzipora El-Rei, the Hebrew and Turkish vocalist; bassist Rani Lorentz; a Turkish oud and kanun master named Mumin Sesler; cantorial master Rabbi David Menachem; and Muhammad Gadir, a nine-year-old Bedouin singer.

"[Gadir] lives in the village next to us, and I know his father from childhood. We are like family," Barak said.

He said the "interfaith dialogue aspect" of the band happened organically.

"It was nothing I had thought about doing. It just naturally happened. We have a very good relationship. This area is very peaceful. We love the culture around us," he said.

Barak said the band represents a living example that the power of music can transcend boundaries and differences.

"It shows what happens when people of goodwill and dedication to unity bring their hearts and talents together for mutual harmony and respect and inspiration," he said.

"It is very special. I can see it in the crowd. Also in different countries where we play, people – it really touches them and shows different possibilities for things to evolve and not just be in the way we are used to thinking about it and see in the media."

Barak said what is unique about their performances is that they go beyond what is happening on the stage.

"It can't happen without the crowd. The crowd is part of the scene that's happening on the stage and we welcome everyone to come and be part of it," he said.

"I think music is the highest level of communication between people. If you think about it, there is no one who doesn't like music. Everyone likes different types of music, but when we try to connect on this level of music and not just starting to go deep inside the different conversations – it's surprising to see how you can connect on this high level and how it can affect daily life."

Diwan Saz is currently touring a number of North American cities, including Boston and Vancouver. For more information, visit www.diwansaz.com. ■

Young jazz musician following in his family's footsteps

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A new generation of jazz musicians is emerging in Canada, and saxophonist Jake Koffman is one of its brightest stars.

Koffman, 28, has been making a name for himself playing at Toronto clubs and recording. He's working in the family business – making music – as did his two grandfathers, Canadian jazz icon Moe Koffman and Toronto Symphony Orchestra conductor Victor Feldbrill.

Moe Koffman was best known for his Swinging Shepherd Blues, a 1957 Canadian and U.S. hit he wrote and recorded on flute. The single became a standard and helped to put Canadian jazz on the map.

Like Moe, Jake is a woodwind player. He learned to play clarinet at 13, while attending St. Andrew's Junior High School in Toronto. A year later, he began studying saxophone, his main instrument today. Around that time, he visited his grandfather several times for music lessons.

"He taught me the fundamentals, proper breathing technique and how to get a nice sound from an instrument," Koffman said.

That year, 2001, he played Swinging Shepherd Blues on alto sax at St. Andrew's and, coincidentally, two hours later was summoned to the school office to hear devastating news about his grandfather.

"I got called down and [was] told he had just passed," Koffman said.

But other family members were there to support the budding musician. Koffman's father, Herbie, used to play trumpet, and his grandfather, on his mother's side, is Victor Feldbrill, 90, a violinist who conducted the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in the 1970s.

Koffman said Feldbrill, who bought him his first clarinet, is more of an encouraging grandfather, while Moe was his first musical influence. Jake didn't expect to make music a career, but over time discovered his own ability.

"I never thought I would get into music until I noticed that it came easier to me than other people," he said.

From the age of 13, Koffman has been gigging, playing in punk, hip hop, blues, R&B, reggae and wedding bands, but he confirmed his dedication to jazz when he enrolled in the Humber College jazz program. Since graduating in 2009, he has established himself as a band leader and sideman and he released his first CD last October.

Jake Koffman.

> I never thought I would get into music until I noticed that it came easier to me than other people

Koffman loves performing – "and the big rush you get from playing in front of people," – but going into the studio to record his first CD was nerve-wracking, he said.

"Making a studio album is a lot different than playing live. I was obviously nervous."

Koffman's excellent debut album, The Jake Koffman Quartet, showcases ballads and the up-tempo bebop Koffman enjoys playing. His grandfather was one of the first Canadian jazz players to adopt the bebop style that came out of New York in the early 1940s.

Most of the material on the CD is original, including Koffman's minor blues Drake Lake and Moe Koffman's For Jezz, which is dedicated to Jake's step-grandmother. A couple of the tunes were written by the quartet's pianist Bernie Senensky, who played with Moe, and one was penned by the group's drummer, Morgan Childs.

Koffman plays saxophone and flute, and Neil Swainson, who also played with Moe, is on bass. One of the CD's tracks, Laura, a standard, has been on rotation at the radio station JAZZ-FM.

For the past three years, Koffman has been a member of the horn section of singer Nikki Yanofsky's band whenever she plays Toronto. Koffman was thrilled when Yanofsky's mentor, Quincy Jones, a record producer who's worked with some of the great musicians of the 20th century, introduced Yanofsky's band at one of her performances here last spring.

"He grabbed my sheet of music and said, 'Yeah, it looks good,'" Koffman recalled. "It was a great experience."

Although being a musician can be a precarious lifestyle, Koffman said he wouldn't have it any other way. "It can be scary because you never know when your next paycheque is coming. But I love it. I wouldn't do anything else."

You can listen to Koffman's album on Spotify and download tracks from iTunes, and you can connect with him on Facebook. For more information, visit www.jakekoffman.com. ■

SPECIAL TO THE CJN

"Bubble feed, portside! All eyes on bubbles!" Alex Carroll, our naturalist guide shouted, sending everyone on our small expedition boat rushing to the rails as five humpback whales emerged on the water's surface, each spouting fountains, swimming nose to tail in a giant circle.

Each about 45 to 50 feet long, they moved as if synchronized, flipping tails high as they dove down, leaving a ring of bubbles in their wake. "You're seeing a rare sight of gams – or groups of humpbacks – feeding together," Carroll said. "They're typically solitary mammals, but they've communicated to rally to create a bubble net to corral the bloom of small fish and krill, and push them to the surface so they can feed."

Minutes later, the whales breached the surface, jostling in a feeding frenzy, their mouths gaping as they inhaled their catch. So close, we could see their jaws and baleen plates that filter the food. "These whales have communicated, creating sounds by controlling the airflow through their pharynx," Carroll said.

Explaining that she is an acoustic technician, she dropped a microphone into the water so we could hear their oscillating tones. "Wow! Tones usually evolve in a slow progression, but we just heard five harmonics!" Carroll exclaimed, raising the microphone. Amazed, we watched as the whales repeated their act four times, the last diving so close and under our boat, we felt their spray. "This is the most beautiful sight I've ever seen," Carroll said when they disappeared and then surfaced in the distance.

Ten minutes later, while sailing through the Saginaw Channel near Point Retreat Lighthouse, she shrieked: "Orcas, starboard!" Counting fins slicing the sea, and black-and-white bodies arching into the air, we figured on 18 or 20.

"Orcas or killer whales are pod oriented and stay with their mothers. They usually hang near the coastline, so it's rare to see them here." Carroll dropped her microphone again, dazzling us with the orcas' sonar songs.

'Rabbi' reaches congregation of millions

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

In the summer of 2012, David Julian Hirsh found his calling as a rabbi, and reached a congregation of around 750,000 Americans a week. A year later, he traded that job for a cantor's robes and got an even bigger audience. In November 2014, Hirsh found the biggest reception of his career – as a rabbi again – yet did so in front of a whopping five million people.

What is Hirsh's trick to getting a large, faithful following? Play a Jewish spiritual leader on television.

Hirsh, a Montreal native, has found his niche playing roles that connect him to his Jewish roots. He played a rabbi in both the final season of Showtime's drug comedy Weeds and a recent episode of the NBC thriller Grimm.

Meanwhile, his acclaimed performance as an Orthodox cantor in the Lifetime movie Twist of Faith earned Hirsh a Canadian Screen Award nomination this year.

"I didn't think that I'd be able to merge the two in any way," he says, referring to his religion and his acting.

"When I started doing theatre, I was working with the Jewish [Repertory] Theater of New York and I was lucky enough to work on these roles that had spiritual elements. In Hollywood, [I thought] you're not going to find that anywhere."

For his portrayal of Rabbi David Bloom on Weeds, Hirsh tried to adopt his grandfather's Polish accent. The voice did not thrill series creator Jenji Kohan, he tells The CJN. However, Kohan had wanted to be a rabbi and tried to offer some of her own thoughts about faith into the series through that character.

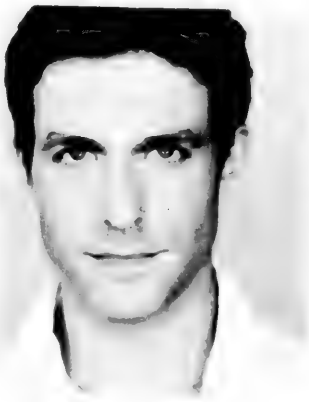
"She was wrestling with some interesting themes… that she was able to write in for the rabbi that I think a lot of us wrestle with," Hirsh says. "To be able to touch any of that in Hollywood is a great thing."

Originally, Hirsh only meant to get into acting as a hobby before law school, but says he fell in love with the craft during a summer program in New York City. He aspired to work mainly in theatre, but eventually made his way to Los Angeles to audition for "pilot season."

Despite his newfound specialty for tackling religious roles, Hirsh is still looking for parts. Now living in Los Angeles, Hirsh says he takes acting classes every week and runs out to auditions at least once a day. Lead roles on short-lived Canadian comedy Naked Josh and the TNT medical drama Hawthorne helped to boost his resume, but screen work is not constant.

"Even if you've reached a high level of success… you're still going for job interviews at the age of 40," he says.

Regardless, the Jewish parts are his favourite ones, Hirsh says. Now that he has cornered the market for playing rabbis, he is working on developing a show for Canadian television. He says it is a historical drama centred on the Jewish mob in Montreal in the 1940s and 1950s.



David Julian Hirsh

Beyond recent jobs, Hirsh has been attached to various Jewish roles in his career. In 2006, he starred as the protagonist in the CBC/BBC adaptation of the Mordecai Richler novel, St. Urbain's Horseman. On the New York stage years earlier, he played a rabbi's son. Elliot Gould played the rabbi in that production. Years later, Hirsh recommended Gould for a small part in Horseman.

For Twist of Faith, Hirsh played Jacob Fisher, a Brooklyn cantor mourning the loss of his family. He eventually finds a sort of salvation in a small Alabama town, where he befriends Nina, a church choir leader played by R&B singer Toni Braxton.

> "Even if you've reached a high level of success… you're still going for job interviews at the age of 40."

The role of a Jewish man falling in love with a black Christian woman could have courted a lot of controversy, but the interfaith themes resonated with audiences. The part also called on Hirsh to sing next to Braxton, which is no easy feat.

Hirsh says that Twist of Faith was the most meaningful performance of his career. To prepare for the part of a man going through mourning, Hirsh thought of his grandparents, Holocaust survivors who lost much of their family in the war.

"This [film] was one of the first times I felt at peace," Hirsh says. "I felt fulfilled as an actor and as myself. It was all connected. I hope and pray I get more roles like that."

"The study of acting is the study of life. So when whatever's happening in my life is happening in my work, it's kind of nice."■

Dylan, Cohen and the music of the Akedah

JIM DIAMOND
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Since the recent release of Bob Dylan's (née Robert Zimmerman) The Basement Tapes Complete, and Leonard Cohen's 80th birthday, I've been contemplating two of the greatest musical icons and poets laureate of rock music in the '60s and onward and how their music emerges from their Jewishness.

The title track of Dylan's 1965 album, Highway 61 Revisited, begins provocatively with a partial retelling of the opening lines in the binding of Isaac narrative (Akedah) that originally appear in Genesis 22. The first stanza reads as follows:

"Oh God said to Abraham, 'Kill me a son.' Abe says, 'Man, you must be puttin' me on.' God say, 'No.' Abe say, 'What?' God say, 'You can do what you want Abe, but the next time you see Me comin' you better run.' Well, Abe says, 'Where do you want this killin' done?' God says, "Out on Highway 61.'"

A few years later, Leonard Cohen, released his own version of that same biblical narrative in The Story of Isaac. Part of its message was a protest against the older generation's decisions to send their children to war. Consider Cohen's rebuke:

"You who build these altars now, to sacrifice these children, you must not do it anymore. A scheme is not a vision, and you never have been tempted by a demon or a god. You who stand above them now, your hatchets blunt and bloody, you were not there before. When I lay upon a mountain and my father's hand was trembling with the beauty of the world."

The Akedah's theme of trial, sacrifice, martyrdom and death of the beloved son, which so critically informs and shapes subsequent Jewish, as well as Christian, theology seeps its way into modern popular music. These songs cannot possibly be understood first, without understanding their rootedness in a long Jewish tradition engaging the significance of music, and second, without a close look at their direct referent — one of the most powerful and shocking passages in the Hebrew Bible.

The very name Israel midrashically compounds the words song (shir) and God (el) which captures both the metaphysical bond between God and music, and the physical uniqueness of Israel as the national reflection of this integral bond.

Moses Nahmanides (13th century)considered the song at the end of Deuteronomy a précis of the entire Jewish historical experience – "Now this song, which is our true and faithful testimony, tells us clearly all that will happen to us." Jewish experience and chronology produce a divine musical score. Thus, by renaming Jacob as Israel, the angel he struggled with introduces music into his existence. It is no coincidence that immediately afterward, if only for a fleeting moment, Jacob reunites with Esau, his estranged brother, in a genuine mutual expression of love.

The formal mitzvah that obligates Jews individually to write a Torah scroll is derived from a particular divine mandate addressed to Moses and Joshua to inscribe one small segment of the Torah, the Song of Moses – "And now write you this song and teach it to the Israelites" (Deut. 31:19). The rabbinic rereading of the command transforms the entire Torah into an epic poem, a song. The minor poem of Parshat Ha'azinu mirrors the major "poem" of the Torah from Genesis to Deuteronomy.

Leonard Cohen's The Story of Isaac was partly a protest against the Vietnam War.

Just as only nature heard the divine voice at Creation, the poem commences in kind with nature – the heaven and the earth – as God's audience. And just as the Torah moves from the universal story of creation to the particular story of a single people, concluding with it and its leader on the cusp of establishing its own homeland, so too does the poem crescendo from its opening in Creation to its climax in the people of Israel and its land.

R. Naftali Tzvi Yehudah Berlin, (Netziv, 1816-1893), claimed that the poem captures the nature of the Torah much better than prose in its covert allusiveness that discloses meaning far beyond the simplicity and overt message of prose. The profound discoveries of the sage transform the talmid chacham (wise student) into the Torah's troubadour.

Dylan and Cohen, rock's talmidei chachamin, emerge out of this tradition in which song and Torah study, poetry and spiritual devotion, are intertwined in a sacred embrace. Their turning to Judaism's sacred texts is not sacrilegious but rather midrashic extensions of the profound role music plays within the tradition. In order to afford them their due, we need to apply Netziv's methodology, searching for meaning in the songs' allusions.

Highway 61, winding its way some 2,250 kilometres across the United States, from the south in New Orleans to the north in Minnesota, symbolizes the spectrum of genres of quintessential American music. Dylan anchors that route in the image of the Akedah, which animates it with both the terror of encounters with God and the adventurous discovery of the lengthy road that traverses a wide swath of his own country. The road therefore discloses the endless musical possibilities it encompasses.

Songwriters' music emerges from their Jewishness

BOB DYLAN HIGHWAY 61 REVISITED

If the killing is to be done on that highway, then perhaps Dylan appropriates Abraham's encounter and trial as a paradigmatic symbol of breaking new ground in poetry and musical creativity.

The music that deserves to travel this road needs to adopt the boldness, the morally shocking, the risk taking, the offensiveness and the suffering that must have informed Abraham's willingness to sacrifice what he most loved. If the poet songwriter wants to play it safe and compose comfortable music, then she "better run."

For music to approach the realm of the transcendent, it requires the censure and moral outrage that novelty and pioneering so often attract. The toll for the musical highway of meaningful inventiveness is sacrifice of the highest order.

> Cohen's treatment of Abraham, like Dylan's is tinged with both reverence and revulsion

Cohen's treatment of Abraham, like Dylan's, is tinged with both reverence and revulsion. Abraham's relationship with his son starkly contrasts with those "over 30" in Cohen's own time, who fail to measure up to the tragic nobility of their biblical predecessor. The current child sacrificers are "schemers" not driven by a "vision."

Misguided or not, Abraham sets out sincerely to accomplish something much larger than himself, to pursue a vision that leaves a sacred legacy. A scheme, on the other hand, colloquially conveys a sense of deviousness and of immoral plotting to exploit others for one's own benefit. Playing on the midrash that Abraham's trial is prompted by Satan, one can judge Abraham's test to have been invoked either negatively by a "demon" or positively by a "God," but his temptation to murder at least reflects a relationship with the Transcendent, with something beyond his own existence. The parents of Cohen's Vietnam era have no such excuse, no temptation other than their own cruel self-interest.

Also reminiscent of the midrashic uniqueness of Abraham's knife, signified by the rare Hebrew term ma'akhelet. Abraham's weapon in Cohen's hands is elegant. Earlier in the song, Abraham's axe is said to be "made of gold." It was neither "blunt," nor crafted to cause the most excruciating pain, nor "bloody," since at the end of the trial Abraham in fact does not sacrifice his son. Axes used as weapons are normally made of copper, bronze, iron or steel, and so the preciousness of Abraham's axe of gold almost certainly indicates ornamental use rather than weaponry.

Cohen's contemporary generation's willingness to sacrifice its children is no real test, for the love its parents feign for their children is superficial, and therefore effortlessly overcome. Their love bears no resemblance to Abraham's passionate and all-consuming love for Isaac, as the midrash understands the implications of the heightened biblical multi-phrasing: "your son, your only one, the one you love, Isaac." They "were not there before" and thus cannot hope to stand in Abraham's shoes.

Cohen exquisitely blends the biblical narrative, rabbinic midrash, and his own midrashic ingenuity to first evoke the nightmarish terror in the murderous movement of Abraham's hand over Jacob's throat. But it also resonates paradoxically with a type of "beauty" in Abraham's gesture that contrasts starkly to the cruel, crude and barbaric drafting of Cohen's contemporary children to the foreign battlefield. Cohen's music itself annotates the "trembling" of the Akedah with "beauty."

Now I understand what initiated one of the great Jewish master-disciple relationships of the 20th century. After years of study and searching for a teacher to whom he could indenture himself, Rav David Cohen, known as the Nazir, visiting the same residence in Switzerland as Rav Abraham Isaac HaKohen Kook (1865-1935), overheard Rav Kook praying in the morning. He was so enraptured by Rav Kook's musical rendition of the Akedah, "with an exalted song and melody," that he immediately knew his quest had come to an end, and he became Rav Kook's devoted acolyte for the remainder of his life. He captures Rav Kook's melodiously overwhelming effect by adopting the biblical description of King Saul's own transformation as a result of joining a prophetic musical troupe when he "was turned into another man."

If the retelling of a horrifying narrative such as the Akedah, imbued with what Kierkegaard called "fear and trembling," could, by its chanting, be spiritually transformative and inspire the kind of cathartic enlightenment Saul himself experienced, then one can be certain that the singer, in this case Rav Kook, is the one who knows how to extract beauty from every other part of the Torah. Leonard the kohen, in his rendition of the Akedah, follows the lead of these earlier kohanim in communicating its inner beauty through song. ■

PASSOVER FOOD

Eat a Passover dinner in style

ALINA DAIN SHARON
JNS.ORG

For some of us, a certain measure of austerity is associated with the Passover holiday. Just as our people were forced to eat unleavened bread after escaping from slavery in Egypt, we forgo bread and other leavened products in favour of matzah for a week.

At the same time, restaurant chefs, cookbook authors and home cooks alike have been embracing the idea that cooking on Passover does not need to be inherently bland – and can even be upscale.

"The purpose of Passover is to celebrate our freedom from slavery in Egypt. Eating unleavened bread/matzah is due to the haste in which we left. But by no means is the purpose of Passover to remember the lack of normal food," says Joy of Kosher cookbook author Jaime Geller.

"As with all celebrations, we mark this momentous, life-altering, sea-splitting event in our history with food, family and prayer," she adds.

Joy of Kosher with Jamie Geller Magazine and JOYofKOSHER.com staff members, and Geller herself, "stretch and flex and exercise our culinary muscles each and every year, coming up with new, creative, inspired and easy recipes and menus to make this Passover the most delicious, enjoyable, memorable holiday ever," Geller said.

The following recipes from JOYofKOSHER.com can make for a fancy kosher-for-Passover dinner that Geller believes will impress your guests.

Salmon Cakes With Tropical Fruit Salsa

Croquettes are cute and elegant for your starter course. They're also wonderfully light and refreshing. The tropical salsa is the perfect complement to the richness of the salmon. The balance of sweet and savoury flavours instantly pleases the palate. This is a starter with zing!

For cakes:

- ❑ 1 (2-lb.) side of salmon, skin on
- ❑ 1/2 cup red onion, diced
- ❑ 2 tbsp. matzah meal
- ❑ 2 large eggs, lightly beaten
- ❑ 1 tsp. kosher salt
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper
- ❑ 4 tbsp. olive oil

For salsa:

- ❑ 1 cup diced pineapple
- ❑ 1/2 cup diced mango
- ❑ 1/2 cup diced red onion
- ❑ 2 tbsp. chopped cilantro
- ❑ 1/2 jalapeno, seeded and finely chopped
- ❑ juice of 1 lime
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. kosher salt

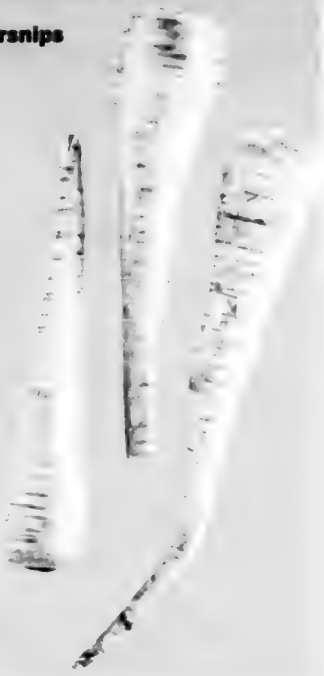
Preheat oven to 350 and lightly grease a large baking sheet. Bake salmon, skin side down, for 25 to 30 minutes or until cooked all the way through. Let cool completely.

Once salmon is cooled, gently flake away from the skin and break into large chunks. Place in a large bowl and combine with eggs, red onion, matzah meal, salt and pepper. Stir to mix well. Scoop about 1/3 cup at a time into your hands and form into a round patty about 1/4-in. thick. Place on a sheet pan and repeat with remaining mixture until you have formed 10 cakes. Refrigerate for 30 minutes.

Meanwhile, in a medium bowl combine pineapple, mango, red onion, cilantro, jalapeno, lime juice and salt. Mix well and set aside.

Heat olive oil in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Fry 5 cakes at a time for about 5 to 8 minutes per side or until golden brown and crispy. Drain on a paper towel-lined plate while frying remaining cakes. To serve, top each cake with a few tablespoons of salsa. Makes 10 cakes.

Grilled Ribeye With Crispy Parsnips



Ribeye is one of the most popular, juiciest, expensive steaks on the market. This cut is more marbled than others, which makes the steak especially tender and flavourful. Crispy parsnips are the perfect, slightly sweet alternative to French fries.

- ❑ 8 medium parsnips, peeled
- ❑ 4 cups olive oil
- ❑ 6 rib eye steaks, 1-in. thick, room temperature (6-8 oz.each)
- ❑ kosher salt
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper

Using a peeler, peel parsnips into thin strips until you cannot peel anymore of the parsnip.

Heat oil over medium high heat. Fry parsnips in batches for 2 to 3 minutes or until golden brown. Remove and let drain on paper towels and sprinkle with salt. Repeat until all parsnips are fried.

Heat grill pan over high heat. Season steaks liberally with salt and pepper and grill for 4 to 5 minutes per side for medium rare doneness. Let rest 5 minutes before serving or slicing. ■

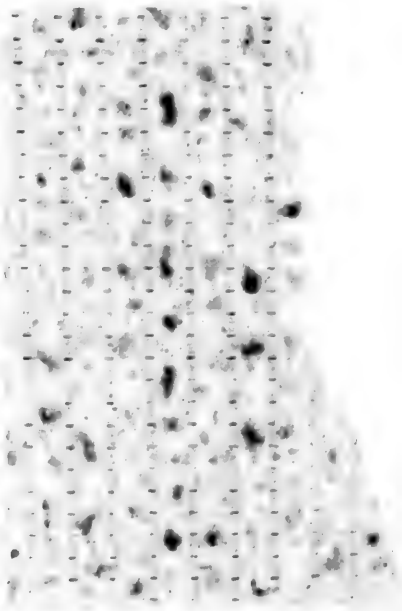
Evoking memories of the holiday



FRANCINE KURLANDSKI
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I always wish that I could view the Passover holiday with the eyes of a child. I remember the excitement in the house. Everyone was scurrying around with chores to do, to help out and bring in the holiday that continues to fill me with the memory and smells of days gone by. But that enchantment never really leaves. The child is still inside me, and now I am the mother, instilling that same excitement in my children, and yes, still in myself.

To make the seder meals a success requires determination and ingenuity. Menus are planned, new items need to be bought to replace the worn, and the strategy begins. It starts with the home being dusted, polished and cleaned from top to bottom. The Passover dishes are brought up from the stairwell. Every dish, cup and serving piece brings back for me the nostalgia and beautiful memories of those who passed them on. Every item is a treasure that evokes a story that's etched in family history. The favourites of generations past are served such as gefilte fish, matzah balls, brisket, tzimmes and farfel kugels

So here are some recipes to continue the enchantment of the holiday – meals for the child, parents, grandchildren and friends all to enjoy. Chag Samayach.

Brisket And Stuffed Potato

- ❑ 4 lb. brisket
- ❑ 1 cup water
- ❑ 2 mediums onions
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1 tsp. paprika
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. garlic
- ❑ 8 potatoes peeled, cut in half
- ❑ 1/2 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 1 small onion, grated
- ❑ 1 egg
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper

Place brisket in a large pot with water, onions, salt, pepper, paprika and garlic. Cook slowly, covered, on top of stove, turning meat often. Add water as needed until meat is brown and tender about 2 -1/2 hours. Remove from pot.

Scoop out centres of potatoes and blend in food processor. Add matzah meal, grated onion, egg, salt and pepper. Fill potato cavity.

Cook potatoes in the gravy from the roast until soft. Slice the roast. Reheat with potatoes and serve.

Award-Winning Vegetable Kugel

- ❑ 2 cups shredded potatoes
- ❑ 2 cups shredded carrots
- ❑ 2 cups shredded zucchini
- ❑ 1 medium onion
- ❑ 1/3 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 2 large eggs
- ❑ 1/4 cup vegetable oil
- ❑ 1/8 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/8 tsp. pepper

Place each vegetable through food processor shredder and measure. Preheat oven to 350. Grease a large pan.

Place all the ingredients together in a large bowl and stir until well blended. Spoon into pan and bake 45 to 60 minutes until cooked through and top is golden brown. Cut into 12 pieces and serve. ■

Breakfasts to whet your appetite

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Breakfast can pose certain challenges at Passover. I mean, how many times can you eat matzah brei? Or, what do you do if your child, like my son, doesn't like kosher for Passover cereals? Or is used to muffins, pancakes or waffles to get him started on his way in the morning? Well, you improvise. The recipes below are my adaptation of some regular recipes made kosher for Passover. The first recipe is basically a muffin batter made in the form of a cake, to bring that something special to your breakfast table. The Apple Pancake Puff is made in an 8-in. square, which alleviates the problem of flipping and having a couple of skillets going.

Blueberry Muffin Cake

This muffin in cake form is wonderful accompanied by yogurt or even some butter. I think it's kind of fun to stand things on their head – how many times can you offer cake to your youngsters for breakfast and be pleased about it?

- ❑ 1 cup potato starch
- ❑ 1/4 cup + 2 tbsp. matzah cake meal
- ❑ 1/2 cup almond meal
- ❑ 2 tsp. kosher for Passover baking powder
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. baking soda
- ❑ 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar
- ❑ 1/2 cup unsalted butter or margarine, melted
- ❑ 2 large eggs, at room temperature
- ❑ 1/2 cup milk, at room temperature
- ❑ 2 tsp. grated lemon zest
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups fresh blueberries

Preheat the oven to 350. Lightly grease a 9-inch springform pan. Line the bottom with a circle of parchment paper; set aside.

Whisk together the potato starch, cake meal, almond meal, baking powder, salt and soda; set aside.

In a separate bowl, whisk together the sugar, butter, eggs, milk and lemon zest. Pour the wet ingredients over the dry ingredients, stirring with a rubber spatula just until mixed. Fold in the blueberries. Transfer the mixture to the prepared pan.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven until a cake tester inserted in the centre comes out clean, about 45 minutes. Cool the cake in the pan on a wire rack. Serve warm. Makes 8 servings.

Apple Pancake Puff

Akin to a German puff pancake, this breakfast treat is piled high with razor-thin slices of apple. If you have a mandolin, use it – it will save you time. If not, then simply slice the apples very thinly. I like to use a mixture of Red Delicious and Granny Smith apples, which keeps the apple puff a bit tart. In a pinch, slice the apples the night before and store them in some acidulated water overnight to prevent browning.

- ❑ 6 tbsp. potato starch
- ❑ 2 tbsp. matzah cake meal
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. kosher for Passover baking powder
- ❑ pinch each cinnamon and salt
- ❑ 2 large eggs, at room temperature
- ❑ 1/4 cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 2 tsp. vanilla sugar
- ❑ 1/3 cup milk
- ❑ 2 tbsp. melted butter
- ❑ 3 apples, peeled, cored and very thinly sliced.

Preheat the oven to 400. Lightly grease an 8-in. square baking pan. Line the pan with parchment paper so that there is a two-in. overhang on two sides.

Whisk together the potato starch, cake meal, baking powder, cinnamon and salt in a bowl.

In a separate large bowl, whisk the eggs with both sugars until they're a little pale, about two minutes. Whisk in the milk and then the melted butter. Using a rubber spatula, add the apples, tossing them gently until the apples are well coated. Transfer the mixture to the prepared pan.

Bake in the centre of the preheated oven until the batter is set and the apples are softened, 30 to 35 minutes.

Cool the pan on a wire rack for 5 minutes. Serve in squares. Makes 6 to 8 servings. ■

One menu three ways for Passover

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Dairy, meat or pareve – what to cook for Passover? For the seder meals, there is only one way to go – meat. But what about the vegetarians at your table? I have a least three at mine. So there you go, searching for other recipes that you can add to your already very large menu. Well here is the answer: one menu three ways. Prep and cook these recipes the exact same way, up to just before the end. Then add the extra meat or dairy to some, leaving the rest as they are. You may have trouble deciding which section of your cookbook to tuck these recipes into.

Matzagna

Matzagna is a tasty and fun-to-eat spin on traditional lasagna. To prepare a vegetarian version, just leave out the ground chicken, or substitute with grated cheese for a dairy meal.

- ❑ 2 large eggplants, cut into 1/2-in. cubes
- ❑ 6 tbsp. olive oil
- ❑ 3/4 cup diced onion
- ❑ 2 cloves of garlic, finely chopped
- ❑ 2 cups diced red bell pepper
- ❑ 5 large zucchini, cut into 1/2-inch cubes
- ❑ 1 can (28 oz.) tomatoes, well drained, liquid reserved
- ❑ 1 tbsp. dried basil
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. dried oregano
- ❑ 2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1/4 cup chopped fresh parsley, or one tbsp. dried parsley
- ❑ 2 lb. ground chicken
- ❑ 7-8 sheets matzah
- ❑ reserved tomato liquid mixed with 1/2 tsp. basil and 1/2 tsp. oregano
- oil to grease pan

Heat 4 tbsp. of the oil in a large skillet over medium heat. Add the eggplant and sauté until almost tender. Remove to a dish. Heat the remaining oil in the same skillet over low heat; sauté the onion, garlic then add the zucchini and red pepper. Cook for about 10 minutes, then add the eggplant back to pan. Place over low heat and add the tomatoes, basil, oregano, salt, pepper and parsley. Simmer, uncovered, stirring frequently, for 30 minutes.

Meanwhile, cook the chicken mixture in two batches until just cooked through, about 2 to 3 minutes per batch. With a slotted spoon to drain off any fat, transfer the cooked chicken to a bowl. Refrigerate until needed.

To assemble: grease a 15x10x2-in. Pyrex baking dish with oil. Cover the bottom of the baking dish with a layer of matzah. The matzah can be cut or broken into smaller pieces to fit. With a pastry brush or a spoon, wet the matzah with the tomato liquid and herbs. Spread a layer of the eggplant mixture over the matzah, then one-third of the *cooked ground chicken. Repeat the layering process 2 more times. Bake in 350 oven until heated through, about 50 minutes. Allow to cool for 5 minutes before cutting.

*If you are making a dairy Matzagna, sprinkle 1/2 cup grated cheese over each of the three layers. For pareve matzagna, leave as is.

Zucchini 'Pasta'

Watch the surprise on the faces of your guests when you bring a platter of al dente "spaghetti" to your dining table. To make this zucchini "pasta" you have many options: You could use a spiral vegetable slicer, my new favourite kitchen toy. This tool makes very, very long spaghetti strands out of your vegetables. You can also use a julienne slicer, a vegetable peeler or a mandolin for a similar but shorter pasta effect. This dish is pareve, so it can be served at any meal. To prepare a dairy version, consider adding a sprinkle or a dollop of an interesting cheese. For a meat version, add your favourite meatballs when serving. As the main or as a side dish, this dish will be a hit this Passover, and healthy fun all year round.

- ❑ 5 large zucchinis
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1/4 cup olive oil
- ❑ 3 plum tomatoes, chopped
- ❑ 1 bunch fresh basil leaves, torn

Prepare zucchini "pasta" whichever method that you prefer. Mix salt, pepper and oil. Bring a large pot of water to a boil. Ready a colander over the sink. Heat large fry pan. When water is boiling blanch the zucchini for 20-25 seconds and pour into the prepared colander. Add oil mixture to pan and then add zucchini and tomatoes. Stir-fry until coated and heated through. Add in fresh basil. Drain off any liquid. Twirl with tongs and plate.

Ask Ella

Go out on a high note

Ella Burakowski
ellacjn@gmail.com

Dear Ella,

With tax time around the corner, I went to see my accountant Jack this week. He's been handling my money for decades, and for the first time, I saw signs I may have to find a new accountant. I don't know Jack's exact age, but he is a Holocaust survivor, and I am guessing probably in his mid- to late 80s.

This man has always been sharp as a tack, but while I was there, he made a few obvious errors and asked me questions I knew he had the answers to in the past. I didn't have the heart to say anything and now I'm torn. How do I leave someone whom I've been loyal to for so many years? I don't want to hurt his feelings, but I can't afford to have him working with my money any longer.

When Loyalty Has to End

Dear When Loyalty Has to End,

It's a blessing to be physically and mentally able to accomplish in your 80s what you were able to do in your 40s. Usually, throughout a career, you work your way to the top, hopefully reach a peak then level off. However, an eventual decline in ability and stamina is inevitable.

I can only imagine the horrors Jack lived through in his youth, the struggles he overcame to get to this country and make a new life, and the feeling of pride he and his family must feel for everything he's accomplished. The mere fact that he's still working in a position that requires a sharp mind is a testament to his very character.

At this stage, Jack probably has no clue how to move on without this job. It must terrify him to think of what he will do every day if he doesn't have it. He'll have no routine, no purpose to get up in the morning – or so he may believe.

In hindsight, perhaps you should have gently pointed out the mistakes. Jack may not be aware that he's slipping. It's much easier for you, who only sees him once or twice a year, to see the decline. Maybe Jack or his family are not aware that time has finally taken its toll on his ability to continue in his career.

You have to be practical. Logically you can't use a professional who can't do their job at an optimum level. You can still remain friends, but ultimately you have to be honest. Give Jack the respect he deserves. Point out your concerns and explain why you have chosen to move on. Thank him for the many years he took such good care of your finances.

It would be a shame for Jack to be remembered for the mistakes he made in the end, rather than his successes and incredible endurance that very few people are lucky enough to have into such an advanced age.

There is something to be said about ending on a high note.

Dear Ella,

I used to love my job, but it's no longer challenging. The things I used my mind to solve are now solved by computers.

All I do is program data and the machine spits out answers. After 27 years of doing the same work I think I'm ready for a change. But what can I do? I have hobbies and love to create. I bake, paint, sew and love to decorate, but those aren't careers. I'm so set in my ways, I'm afraid to budge. My job is easy, but I see my life passing before me.

Need a change

Dear Need a change,

Change is scary, especially without a plan. But I can hear that you have done a lot of thinking, and now it's just a matter of putting your courage hat on and making the mental move first. Once you've done that, the actual physical move will require a more concrete strategy.

If you can afford to, perhaps go back to school to learn interior design, or how to become a pastry chef, or how to open your own dressmaking/alteration business. Start with the scores of career assessment quizzes and information sites on the Internet.

Ultimately, you should speak to a professional career counsellor who will know the steps you should take and guide you in the right direction.

Once you have a plan, it will be time to jump in with both feet.

We are the creators of our own destiny. Now go create. ■

Ella's advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

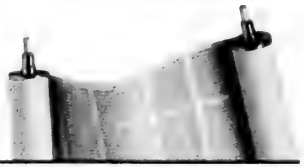
Vayakhel-Pekudei | Exodus 35:1 - 40:38



Rabbi Ilan Acoca explains why every Jew is obligated to build their own mishkan
Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl argues mitzvot can keep us connected to Revelation
Rabbi Catharine Clark on the importance of women's interpretations of the Torah

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

We know that the Mishkan serves as a model for the divine service of every individual Jew. Every one of us is entrusted with the obligation to build an internal mishkan within in order to make ourselves a living sanctuary for the Divine Presence.

But just as the Mishkan required construction, so do we. In constructing our internal mishkan, we are apt to wonder whether we are capable of producing exquisite, delicate, complex qualities within ourselves and our lives. Are we capable of achieving great heights? Can we truly make ourselves into a fitting home for the Presence of the Almighty Himself.

Parshat Pekudei reassures us: if we truly desire and make a firm decision to grow, our efforts will be blessed from on high. When we make the continual effort to come to receive the Torah's guidance, we will not be left empty-handed. Our receptivity will be rewarded with guidance, help and internal strength. The knowledge, understanding and wisdom we yearn for will be forthcoming. We will receive what we need to succeed at building our internal mishkan, glorious and beautiful, exquisite and sacred – the actualization of our truest self. What the Almighty Himself desires is our sincere commitment. All the rest is in His hands.

I was recently privileged to be part of a Canadian Sephardi delegation that went to visit the Canadian Parliament. The purpose of the delegation was to make the government aware of our existence and to advocate on behalf of Jews from Muslim countries.

The most uplifting moment was when some of us met with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who spent time with us thus building a mishkan in each one of us.

May we all merit to build an internal mishkan within us and our peers. ■

The double Torah portion of Vayakhel and Pekudei closes the book of Exodus and concludes the 10 chapters devoted to the Mishkan, the portable wilderness sanctuary. The Torah presents detailed, formal and ritualized directions of what to do and a comprehensive report of the construction and dedication of the portable sanctuary. Amy Cooper Robertson suggests that the details are so exact that, paradoxically, we are bewildered by them. Thus the literary text actually simulates the incomprehensible experience of Revelation.

This would correlate with the observation of the great Spanish sage, Rabbi Moshe ben Nachman, that "The essence of the Mishkan is to be a place for the divine Presence at the Ark." As the Ark of the Covenant, it was intended to safeguard the sacred stones that were the expression of the Covenant. As the Ark of Testimony, it was to be a place where God "shall meet with you there and speak with you." Commanded first but constructed last, the Ark was the heart of the Mishkan and the way that the people of Israel could continue to experience the connection of the ephemeral event of Revelation.

In our day, those who seek the Presence of God have neither the Tablets of Testimony nor the Ark of the Covenant. We wander in our personal wilderness, hoping for an occasional moment of inspiration. Although we lack the sanctuary symbolic of Sinai, we do have the mitzvot, which add holiness to our lives and create tzavta, a way of coming together with God and community, a finite act that has the possibility of evoking the Infinite. ■

In the long list of items Bezalel made for the Mishkan, the Torah gives us an unexpected detail. We learn that the wash basin and its stand were made of the copper from the mirrors of the women stationed at the entrance to the Tent of Meeting. For no other item in this account of the artisan's work do we learn who supplied the raw materials.

In his commentary on this verse, Ibn Ezra tells us that it is the practice of all women to beautify themselves each morning using their mirrors. However, these special women, who were so close to the holiness of the Mishkan, willingly gave up their mirrors and their attention to appearance in the service of God.

Ibn Ezra's comment is a stark example of what was lost to us because for centuries, women's interpretations of the Torah were not recorded. Ibn Ezra thinks that women so enjoy our morning grooming routines that it takes being next to the Presence of the Lord to get us to give up our mirrors. I wonder if Ibn Ezra's daughters would agree.

In reality, many women find this attention to our appearance oppressive. These morning beauty routines take time, time that could be better spent on work, family, self and community. Yet, if we do not make this effort every morning to style our hair and apply our makeup, we and the work we do are not taken seriously – even at times when we are supposed to be close to God. A few years ago, in keeping with the prohibition against ointments, a colleague of mine did not wear makeup on Yom Kippur. A congregant criticized her for failing to look "professional" on the most important day of the Jewish year.

Maybe it is time for each of us to turn in our mirrors to the service of God. ■

This awesome whale watching experience – an intimate view of whales that people dream of – was just one of the specialty excursions that Silversea's Silver Shadow featured on our 10-day Alaska itinerary looping from Vancouver.

Having previously sailed all of Silversea's vessels, and cruised Alaska's Inside Passage on large ships, we'd chosen this cruise for two reasons: the indulgence to interlace luxury and nature, and because the 540-passenger, 36,000-ton ship's small size would allow navigation deep into narrow channels to sites that prohibit larger vessels.

Silversea delivered every promise of luxury in an all-inclusive package and beyond every expectation for unique nature experiences, proving to me (a fourth-time cruiser to these waters) that I can return several times, each for different sensations.

With many excursions available for this itinerary, Silversea's travel journal – offering everything from guided culture tours, sea-kayaking, sport-fishing from fly-in lodges, scuba-diving, dog-sledding to rainforest hikes – was delivered early, a boon for advance planning.

From Ketchikan – our first port of call – two half-day tours of Misty Fiords provided a true sense of Alaska's wilderness as a haven for wildlife. On a flight-seeing tour, we came eye-to-eye with an American bald eagle. We could see the yellow ring of its eyes and its piercing gaze, its slick white head and sharp beak, the oily feathers and thick claws clenched towards its abdomen. Separated only by a glass bubble, we watched mesmerized as this noblest bird of prey joined us in a surreal, mid-air dance. Undaunted by our whirring helicopter, it elevated its wings and swooped toward the trees.

A gam of humpback whales in a feeding frenzy.
TOBY SALTZMAN PHOTOS

On the afternoon boat tour, as we navigated between tiny green islands and veered into a narrow fiord, our guide spotted wild birds, hawks diving for prey, eagles nesting in trees. We slowed to a drift near rocks clustered with dozens of seals. Some lazed like shiny lumps; some grunted, slapping their tails; playful babies splashed in the water. When the channel opened to the serene pocket of Rudyard Bay surrounded by mammoth rock mountains, we were awestruck by the silence, interrupted only by the sounds of birds and splashing fish.

In Juneau, we geared for an all-day jaunt combining Mendenhall Glacier and whale watching. As we'd previously taken heli-flights to walk the slippery glacier crest, we hiked the wilderness to the glacier's foot.

Every day, every port brought new adventures. From Skagway, the White Pass & Yukon Steam Train took us above the tree line to the tundra. Golfing in Prince Rupert added a notch to our "courses played." The day spent cruising Tracy Arm was – in a word – spectacular: basking in sunshine, we revelled in unfolding scenery as the Silver Shadow's captain navigated through the narrow channel between sheer walls of the fiord, past ice floes to the turquoise face of Sawyer Glacier.

Our last port of call, Victoria, B.C., was lush with flowers, romantic as ever. With so many options – from kayaking to extreme sport-fishing – we leisurely strolled through Butchart Gardens, enjoyed English High Tea at the Fairmont Empress, then returned to indulge in massages at the 83,000-sq.-ft. spa before a final, epicurean celebration in Silversea's Relais & Chateaux restaurant, Le Champagne. Divine. Disembarking in Vancouver, we wished to return again. ■

Hannah Kehat: Orthodox Israeli feminist pioneer

jshupac@thecjn.ca

Hannah Kehat is a modern Orthodox Israeli academic, teacher and the founder of Kolech - Religious Women's Forum, the country's first Orthodox Jewish feminist organization, which she established 17 years ago. Kehat spoke last month in Toronto and Vancouver at talks sponsored by the New Israel Fund of Canada.

The CJN spoke with her prior to her Canadian appearance about her foray into feminism, Kolech's activist and educational activities, and the key issues that she feels women in Israel – and particularly religious women – are facing today.

Hannah Kehat, founder of Israel's first Orthodox feminist organization, spoke in Vancouver and Toronto last month. YOSSI ALONI (MAARIV) PHOTO

Did you grow up in an Orthodox community?

Yes, I grew up in the haredi neighbourhood of Mea Shearim. It was not considered acceptable for women in this community to go to university, but I decided to do it. This was one of the reasons for my leaving this style of life and changing to a more modern way of life, because I wanted to study and not to give it up.

I left the community when I was about 20 and, other than my parents and siblings, with whom I still have relationships, I cut my connection to it. I went to the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and studied Jewish philosophy and Bible studies. I later did a doctorate at Hebrew U in Jewish philosophy. Now I'm writing, researching and teaching Jewish studies. I teach at some academic colleges in Israel.

Had you always identified as a feminist?

I didn't identify as a feminist at that time when I first left the haredi community. I just wanted to go on with my studies. But in retrospect, I see it was a feminist act not to give up, to fulfil myself and not to become a haredi woman who has to stop her studies and have a big family… Later, at about age 35, I identified as a feminist and started the feminist movement of religious women in Israel. That was about 17 years ago.

What are the biggest issues faced by women in Israel today?

I think, because in Israel there's no separation between church and state, that is the main problem of women in Israel, especially the religious. There's the problem of agunot, and of women who want to convert to Judaism. There's a huge gap between the situation of women and the rabbinic establishment. In the last two years, we've had a bit of success in the Knesset, with members like Aliza Lavie, from Yesh Atid, who tried to change a little bit the laws, but it's really a big challenge. It's very political.

> When we first started Kolech, even to say the word 'feminist' among religious women was forbidden, taboo

We recently helped a lesbian religious woman that a rabbi had shamed and discriminated against, so we took him to court, and he [eventually] had to pay her. We've had some achievements in the Supreme Court. For example, it's now illegal to make a woman go to the back of the bus. I personally sat in the front of a bus between two haredi men this week, and nobody dared say anything, because they know now if they did, the driver would call the police. So we can say we changed that. Kolech was fighting in the Supreme Court for that. We helped to do it. And women at the Western Wall can now pray and nobody bothers them. So there are some achievements.

Aside from the types of activism you mentioned, what are Kolech's main activities?

We have many positive activities, both cultural and educational. We have a lot of workshops and programs in schools to empower young women, teach them and talk to them, and for boys, too, about gender issues, sexual issues. It's a lot of listening and talking to them about issues that bother them as teenagers. We do this in religious, but not haredi, schools, and sometimes in non-religious schools.

We've also published books, newsletters and academic articles.

How many members does Kolech have?

We have about 2,000. And in our Facebook group, we now have about 10,000 people. It's very alive and dynamic.

And last year, a new movement of haredi feminists started to be active on Facebook and we've started to meet them. They come to our meetings. It's the beginning of a change in the haredi world.

What kinds of resistance, or pushback, has Kolech encountered?

Most of the time we're not attacked, but supported, and the dialogue hasn't been too aggressive, though there have been times when it became aggressive.

For example, on the issue of sexual abuse by rabbis, when we started to demand and investigate the issue and deal with complaints against rabbis, we became a target for threats. And there was pressure put on my boss to fire me, on my family and friends. My boss did try to fire me because of these battles and my decision to complain against rabbis, and I was in court for five years and won.

It was hard for the rabbis. We had broken a taboo. Nobody before had talked about sexual harassment or domestic violence in religious communities. There was this idealization that the religious society was a super model, that everyone was OK and that there were no such problems in that community. Kolech was the first organization that started to talk about this and to say, "We have to take this seriously and go to the police." At the end of the day, most rabbis changed their attitudes, and today they really participate and ask us to teach them about these issues.

How do you best get through to women in haredi communities?

There's now this big group of haredi feminists and we meet with them and they admire us and learn from us, come to us for guidance. These women have computers. They're smart and very interesting.

To what extent, if at all, do you draw on Halachah to argue points about feminism?

Sure. We have to use the same language as the rabbis. So, when we fight against a rabbi who has been abusive, we speak about "lo ta'amod al dam reyecha" – that you can't just stand by the suffering of another.

We publish a lot of books and articles about these issues.

Women in Israel, maybe not haredi, but religious Zionist women, today are part of the halachic discussion and write halachic books, responses. Now in Israel we have women who are real scholars in Torah.

What do you see as the best way to create change for women in the haredi world?

I don't know. In the haredi world it will take time, though it has started.

When we first started Kolech, even to say the word 'feminist' among religious women was forbidden, taboo. Every religious woman had to say she was not a feminist. But now, it's not a forbidden word and a lot of young women say they are. There are a lot of interesting processes in the haredi community now having to do with rabbis, yeshivot, political parties. I think that in 10 years, we will see a different society.

I know in modern Orthodox society in Israel, it's also a dynamic process. We have a lot more egalitarian synagogues now in Israel than we did a few years ago. Women are taking part in more duties, like davening, reading Torah. ■

We must safeguard our legacy

Backstory

PAUL SOCKEN

Spending a day in Manhattan recently, I was reminded of the power of seduction. The stately, grand Metropolitan Museum was showcasing a small but stunning exhibition of paintings by El Greco, perhaps the most influential artist in history. The Jewish Museum had a tribute to Helena Rubenstein, a formidable woman who had a major impact on women's cosmetics and the role of women in business. I saw the 9/11 memorial, a striking demonstration of human will and the determination to memorialize loss while affirming life. The venues, the culture, the pulse of one of the great cities of the world are seductive.

It is not hard to see why people spend their whole lives captivated by this culture. In the past, Jews who had the opportunity to leave their cloistered existence – during the Haskalah (Jewish Enlightenment) or the ghettos of eastern Europe – left their religious life and Jewish identity behind to enter the exciting and promising world of whatever culture it was that surrounded them.

This was true in every age. If they had to choose between Greek culture or Judaism, many chose Greek culture. In modern times, it was Polish or German or Hungarian culture over Jewish culture. You had to choose, so many took the path of secular culture. It was either/or. The price of a passport to fame and fortune was shedding your Jewish identity: British prime minister Benjamin Disraeli, German poet and essayist Heinrich Heine, the list is endless.

The story has it that Queen Victoria asked Disraeli, whose father converted to Christianity to enter English society and who raised his son in the church, whether he was Jewish or Christian. He is said to have responded, "Your Majesty, the King James version of the Bible has the Old Testament, then a blank page, and then the New Testament. I am the blank page."

That was then and this is now. Something completely new has arisen in the modern world. No longer is it necessary to choose. That seductive culture, whether American, Canadian, English or other, is no longer inaccessible to the Jew as Jew. For the first time in history, there is no need to choose. Jews can be as observantly Jewish as they like and participate in the culture of their country. This is unprecedented.

Jews don't have to abandon their ancient and venerable past to be fully and completely modern. They can study their source texts of wisdom literature, practise any form or denomination of their religion and still work and live in the same mental and physical space as their fellow citizens of different heritages and religions.

(It is a delicate balancing act for the modern Orthodox Jew who keeps Sabbath and kosher but it can be done. In fact it is being done, by countless thousands across our country and many other countries.)

So the inevitable question imposes itself. In an era when Aboriginal Peoples, African-Canadians and Americans, French-Canadians and others are exploring and asserting their identity and dedicated to preserving it, why are Jews abandoning theirs in droves?

Are the rabbinic and lay leaders of the Jewish community not doing their job? Are the attractions of secular culture so great that they overwhelm the religious culture even when the one need not preclude the other? Has the long reign of religion in Western society run its course?

We ignore this question at our peril. We risk becoming Disraeli's blank page. Jews constitute 7/10 of one per cent of the world. With low birth rates and low rates of affiliation, a minuscule Orthodox community (10 per cent of Jews at best) will represent the future of a people that has given enormously to the world: everything from ethical monotheism to ground-breaking scientific discoveries, from a unique brand of humour to breathtaking business acumen and philanthropy. We owe it to ourselves and to the world to safeguard our legacy. As John Ruskin wrote: "Our duty is to preserve what the past has had to say for itself, and to say for ourselves what shall be true for the future." ■

All-party support for property restitution, and kosher sex toys available

Issue unites Parliament

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the World Jewish Restitution Organization (WJRO), and the Canadian Jewish Holocaust Survivors and Descendants (CJHSD) have welcomed commitments by all parties in Parliament to advocate for restitution of Holocaust-era property in central and eastern Europe. Foreign Minister Robert Nicholson last week joined foreign affairs critics Paul Dewar of the NDP and Marc Garneau of the Liberals, who both issued statements earlier this year urging Canada to press Poland and other countries on the issue. The MPs made the commitment after CIJA and the CJHSD wrote to Dewar, Garneau and former foreign minister John Baird asking for their continued support.

Rabbi helps people get their sexy on

A rabbi in Israel has launched a website where Orthodox people can buy sex toys without being bombarded by nudity and obscene language. Rabbi Natan Alexander, 34, an Australian-born rabbi living in Etzion in the West Bank, launched Better2gether four months ago. The married father of four says the site, which has 200 items for sale – ranging from lube to vibrators to pasties, and all with modest packaging – also appeals to more conservative people turned off by other sexual aid sites. It also offers access to confidential sex advice from therapists and doctors. "I've been told that people really need something like this," he told the Times of Israel.

Schmaltz herring recalled

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA) issued a recall last week for schmaltz herring and spicy schmaltz herring from Elite Salads International of Toronto because the products "may permit the growth of clostridium botulinum," a bacteria that can cause nausea, vomiting, fatigue and, in extreme cases, even death. The products are in 200-gram and 454-gram sizes with best before dates up to May 8. The herring, which may not look or smell spoiled, but could still make people sick, should be returned or thrown out, the CFIA said. ■

The number of years since the last import of produce from Gaza into Israel. The first truckloads of tomatoes and eggplants crossed the border March 12. The decision to allow the move stemmed in part from produce shortages due to the shmittah year.

Quotable

We should all shudder to hear the same rhetoric that led to a "none is too many" immigration policy towards Jews in the '30s and '40s being used to raise fears against Muslims today.

Holocaust memorials

It is incorrect to say that the Wheel of Conscience originally located at the Canadian Museum of Immigration is "the only public symbol of Holocaust remembrance in the country" ("Shoah memorial likely returning to Halifax's Pier 21," Feb. 5).

The Manitoba legislature provided a designated space on its grounds for a Holocaust memorial, which was dedicated on Sept. 6, 1990. Philip Weiss, a well-known Holocaust survivor and educator and former chair of the Winnipeg Jewish community's Holocaust remembrance and memorial committee, spearheaded the campaign to have the monument built.

The monument is in the shape of a broken Magen David and bears the names of over 3,700 victims of the Holocaust whose memory was honoured by surviving family members who resided in Manitoba.

Red Tories

My thanks to Michael Taube ("Why Jews were Red Tories," March 5) for reminding me why I am not a supporter of the current Conservative party, in spite of its welcome support of Israel.

He gloats over the disappearance of Red Tories, declaring that "statist programs dealing with collectivism, social justice and progressive taxation are, I'm pleased to say, no longer part of the Tory diet." A Conservative party that no longer includes social justice among its tenets? Taube quotes former senator Hugh Segal (a Red Tory) as saying that progressive conservatism helped the Tories (then Progressive Conservatives) become "the instrument of freedom and justice."

Is Taube suggesting that today's Conservatives are no longer interested in promoting freedom and justice? Perhaps the picture of Bugs Bunny (a Red Tory?) instead of Taube's name suggests that he is really not serious and that his column is simply a Purim shpiel!

Teacher's lessons linger

Yasher koach to Eli Pfefferkorn for his commentary ("New methods needed to keep memory of Shoah alive," Feb. 26), in which he rightly advises that we need to think differently about we ask questions, find out information and create an oral and written history regarding the Shoah.

Pfefferkorn, a teacher of mine, taught me long ago that we need to look at things with a long-term perspective and that looking at history strictly from a convenient perspective is dangerous in the long term. It is a lesson that I carry with me throughout my life and use on a regular basis.

We should not only thank Pfefferkorn and take his advice to heart, but also implement the changes based on his perspective as a survivor, a fighter for the State of Israel and a teacher to hundreds of Jewish students.

Dissent is not anti-Semitism

Jewish people can do better than this. Repeatedly using the ad hominem fallacy to argue against critics of Israel is unintelligent, unethical and ultimately counter-productive to Jewish interests.

When Palestinians speak up against Israeli injustices, it cannot by any stretch of the imagination be considered the irrational hatred that is anti-Semitism. Saying it is so is tantamount to legitimizing anti-Semitism as a respectable human rights value.

Intelligent debate does not call something a "lie" without offering any evidence. It does not denounce opinions that are not welcome as "hatred" without evidence of racist intent.

Gil Troy's article ("Apartheid slur driven by hatred and lies," March 5) is a shameful continuation of this very un-Jewish practice of arguing with fallacies instead of reality and logic. It shames Jewish people and is more likely to generate anti-Semitism in people who are tired of having their intelligence insulted by this unethical argumentation.

Rambam Health Care Campus
Prepared for all Imminent Scenarios

According to the latest news, Iran and Hezbollah are planning an imminent joint invasion of Israel's northern Galilee region. This reality has forced Rambam Hospital, to make equipping the Sammy Ofer Fortified Underground Emergency Hospital an urgent priority.

The largest structure of its kind in the world, sets a new standard for safe care in times of extreme emergency. This visionary structure converts from a 1,500-vehicle parking lot into a 2,000-bed emergency hospital fortified against conventional and non-conventional weapons.

As Rambam serves over two million residents in the north of Israel, we must be prepared to safely provide the highest level of medical care, especially in these times. the need is more urgent than ever

We cannot do it without your help.

Your gift will help fund one of the most advanced initiatives of its kind in the world and serve as a lasting reminder of your solidarity with Israel at the time of their greatest need.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Are no dues good news?

Risky voluntary fee models make synagogues prove themselves worthy of membership, but shuls already rely on donors who see their value to the community

RABBI AVI FINEGOLD
FOUNDER, THE JEWISH LEARNING LIBRARY, MONTREAL

RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM
BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM CONGREGATION, TORONTO

Rabbi Finegold: Pesach, centred around the seder, is one of the holidays that even minimally affiliated Jews tend to celebrate. However unlike the High Holidays, Pesach does not compel people to flock to synagogues in the same numbers.

I was reminded of this when speaking to someone recently about the new phenomenon of synagogues that choose to not charge dues, relying instead on the value they provide to their congregants and assuming that their congregants will respond by donating accordingly. I must admit that this model is attractive to me, because it seems to force congregations to prove themselves worthy of membership beyond High Holidays and life cycle events.

Have you considered this model at all in your congregation, and if you have, how would you create value around Pesach, an apparently home-centred holiday?

Rabbi Scheim: I have also been interested in the voluntary-dues model that some synagogues have adopted, obviously not without risk on their part.

It's not clear to me, however, that those who contribute generously when the amount is left to their choice are doing so because of value they are receiving in return. Many of my most generous members, who donate well beyond set dues levels, are sporadic attenders of synagogue events. Were they contributing in response to direct, personal benefit that they were receiving, they would likely redirect their generosity elsewhere, rather than to the shul they frequent a few times each year.

They contribute beyond required levels because they believe a community to be stronger with religious institutions that educate, that (hopefully) uplift, and that provide the option of a minyan, of communal prayer, that some, if not all, will need on any given day.

In terms of Pesach, the synagogue and its community can be the vehicle that motivates intensified home observance, and seders that go beyond the Four Questions and dinner. Synagogue can also provide worshippers a venue on the morning after the seder to share their experiences of the previous night's ritual, allowing the home experience to penetrate the community consciousness.

Rabbi Finegold: I would prefer to be optimistic and view the donor who attends infrequently but donates extravagantly as someone who has gained much value from a smaller interaction.

My understanding about voluntary dues is that synagogues are often surprised by how much more most people are willing to give when they're offered the discretion to choose the amount. I would advocate for a model that originates in the opening of the seder, that of "kol dichfin yetei v'yeychol" – let all those who are hungry come and eat.

We invite everyone without considering whether they are wealthy or not, and virtually all congregations follow this model when it comes to dues, sometimes asking for proof of need, but more often than not trusting that one's word is one's bond.

Still, someone needs to pay for the needy, whether it be for a seder meal or the right to communal membership. The ones who pay much more do not do so because they get minimal value from the few times they attend, but because, as you say, they get maximal value from allowing others to attend as well.

Their choice of congregation is a vote of confidence in that community and its leadership, a testament to how much they want others to experience what they have experienced themselves. It's not simply a generic donation to a community with a morning minyan and a nice cantor.

Rabbi Scheim: Being in full agreement with you, and in hoping that even non-voluntary dues-based congregations will show flexibility, enabling those unable to pay full dues to affiliate, I would add another type of synagogue supporter to our roll of honour.

There are those who generously support synagogues they will never attend (often shuls far to the right of their level of practice), sometimes out of guilt – a feeling that they should be more observant – but more often because they value communities of Jews who pray and learn together, even if they themselves have yet to reach the entry point of participation.

As we draw close to Pesach, we recognize those who choose to support and maintain synagogues, and congregations sensitive and responsive to the needs of economically challenged Jews. They understand the significance of "kol dichfin." ■

Toronto City Coun. James Pasternak welcomes a group of young Israeli leaders from the Connecting Leaders in Communities (CLIC) project to city hall on March 11. The program aims to create meaningful relationships between Jews and non-Jews. On this trip, the group, from diverse backgrounds, helped refute the myths spread during Israeli Apartheid Week on campuses. They met with Pasternak and Mayor John Tory and were recognized during a City Council meeting.

Some good advice for politicians of every stripe

The CJN goes to press at noon on Mondays. Most weeks, we work on putting the paper together until the last possible minute, in order to ensure it's as up-to-date as possible. But sometimes, major news happens in the time between when the paper is printed and it gets delivered to your door (though readers can cut down on that lag by logging on to the digital edition of The CJN).

This is one of those weeks.

As I write, Israeli voters are preparing to cast their ballots in a national election; by the time you read these words, however, the election will most likely have been decided. In coming editions of The CJN, we'll have lots to say about the outcome of the election – what it means for Israelis and for the Jewish Diaspora. But for now, we encourage you to visit cjnews.com for up-to-the-minute news and commentary about the election.

Meanwhile, back here in Canada last week, the Jewish community found itself in the middle of a political debate as this country's major parties geared up for their own election campaigns. The dispute centred around the propriety of invoking the Holocaust when referring to events other than the genocide of European Jewry.

On March 9 Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau caused a storm when he told an audience at McGill University, "We should all shudder to hear the same rhetoric that led to a 'none is too many' immigration policy towards Jews in the '30s and '40s being used to raise fears against Muslims today."

Trudeau was ostensibly reacting to two recent incidents: the first was Conservative MP John Williamson's abhorrent comments, just two days earlier, regarding Canada's temporary foreign workers program – that "It makes no sense to pay 'whities' to stay home while we bring in brown people to work in these jobs." (Williamson quickly apologized.) The second was the Harper government's ongoing effort to make it illegal for Muslim women to cover their faces during citizenship swearing-in ceremonies.

A day after Trudeau made his Holocaust reference, Public Security Minister Stephen Blaney offered one of his own. During a hearing regarding Bill C-51, the government's proposed anti-terror legislation, Blaney sought to juxtapose jihadist incitement with propaganda disseminated by the Nazis in the 1930s. "The Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers," he testified. "It began with words."

As The CJN's Paul Lungen reports, Jewish groups were quick to criticize Trudeau for comparing the exclusionary tactics once adopted by the Canadian government to present-day immigration policy. Those same groups, Lungen notes, were not vocally critical of Blaney's comment – though, to be fair, others have previously used the same terminology, and the recent terror attack at a kosher supermarket in Paris indicates that hateful words can lead to tangible danger for Jews.

Still, it's probably best if politicians avoid making comparative references to the Holocaust altogether. As CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel told Lungen, "politicians run an obvious risk when they invoke the Holocaust in policy debates, and we generally think that such references are best avoided, as they distract from the issues at hand."

That's good advice, for politicians of every stripe. ■ — YONI

Feel guilty about reading this? Blame your parents

Deborah Kotz
JTA

In designing and testing theories on how the body programs its 19,000 genes, Moshe Szyf, a geneticist and molecular biologist at McGill University, has expanded the notion of Jewish guilt.

Sure, we might feel bad about passing along hereditary genes that raise our baby's future risk of breast cancer or depression. But now, thanks to Szyf's research, we must contend with the possibility that our experiences early in life could shift how those genes are expressed for generations to come.

Thus young stockbrokers who escaped from the tumbling towers of 9/11 might be raising preschoolers a decade later who are prone to panic when they smell fireplace ash. Those who crash dieted during teenage years might wind up with grandchildren with slower metabolisms designed to better handle starvation.

Researchers studying the children and grandchildren of Holocaust survivors have found that they have higher rates of post-traumatic stress after enduring car accidents, possibly due to modifications in their stress hormone system inherited from their parents.

Szyf, however, prefers to take an optimistic view of his field, called behavioural epigenetics.

"With a deterministic genome, we can't decide what kinds of mutations we pass on, but if experience is important in building a healthy genome, it gives us a feeling of some level of control."

He says he is interested in identifying early markers of adversity to see if they can be altered with lifestyle interventions or drugs.

Born in London and raised in a family of observant Jews, Szyf went to dental school at Hebrew University. While working on his doctoral thesis with an Israeli epigenetics researcher in the late 1970s, he found his real passion and says he has never regretted his decision to abandon dentistry.

For the past two decades, Szyf and his McGill colleagues have been studying methyl groups that attach at various points to strands of DNA. Szyf refers to these groups as "punctuation" that mark genes to determine how they work to help cells manufacture proteins – akin to changing the meaning of a sentence by swapping out an exclamation point for a period.

"These methyl groups make out the language of our DNA, and if they go awry, you're in trouble," Szyf says.

Epigenetics researchers initially believed such changes in genetic programming occurred only during fetal development. But recent landmark studies conducted by Szyf and others suggest that methyl groups could be added to DNA in adulthood – at least in rodents – due to changes in diet or environmental toxins. Those additions could be passed on to future generations, causing permanent changes in gene function.

In a study published last year in the journal Nature, researchers from the Emory University School of Medicine found that mice exposed to a particular odour along with small electroshocks developed a fear of that smell and later gave birth to offspring that also had a high stress response whenever they were exposed to the odour. The researchers also found methylation changes in a smell receptor gene in both the mothers and offspring.

In other experiments, Szyf and his research group examined the DNA of rat pups raised by mothers who neglected them. They found that genes controlling the production of stress hormone receptors had high levels of methyl groups attached to them compared to genes from pups raised by attentive, nurturing mothers. Pups raised by inattentive mothers also acted skittish in response to stress.

The researchers then studied another litter of rat pups from the same mothers, but this time they had the nurturing mothers raise pups from inattentive mothers and vice versa. They found that the extra methyl groups were again added to the pups raised by the neglectful mothers and that these pups had an overactive stress response.

Both sets of pups with the extra methyl groups passed them on to their offspring.

"While the genome can take centuries to change, with epigenetics the physiological response can be immediate but also with lasting effects," Szyf says.

That's unless an intervention is found to shift things back. Szyf and his colleagues found such an intervention in the form of a drug designed to remove methyl groups. Szyf was able to reverse the extra methylation in rats born with it and also change their behaviours back to placid tendencies.

Just how much such epigenetic changes impact human behaviour remains largely unknown, researchers acknowledge.

"We certainly know that human experiences affect how our genes are expressed," says Rachel Yehuda, a professor of psychiatry and neuroscience at the Icahn School of Medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, who has performed epigenetic studies on Holocaust survivors. "But we don't know for sure how this process works and how strong a contributor epigenetics really is compared to other things like genes."

Life experience is capable of shaping perceptions and reactions even without touching DNA. In recent studies Yehuda found that children of Holocaust survivors have altered stress response systems and differences in methylation on the gene that regulates the number of stress hormone receptors. She also found that these alterations were complex and dependent on a mother's age when she went through the Holocaust and whether a father experienced it, too.

"Do uniquely Jewish experiences from the past – like the pogroms our great-grandparents escaped – affect the way we behave today? I think that's a valid question," Szyf says.

"Jews that left Europe were highly self-selected for their survival skills and perseverance," he adds, which might have been due to their genetic tendencies rather than epigenetic changes.

In the end, though, it may not matter whether inherited genes or inherited methylation of those genes or plain-old nurture plays the dominant role.

"Jews have always tended to lead lives that emphasized education, family structure and religious values," Szyf says. So it should come as no surprise that these values have been passed on. ■

Has the BDS movement been effective?

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

A protester carries a pro-BDS poster. Most agree that the movement has not had much impact on Israel's economy or its academic institutions. FILE PHOTO

On the face of it, both sides of the movement to boycott, sanction and divest from Israel have to admit the decade-old movement has chalked up few concrete wins in Canada.

On university campuses, where the BDS campaign, as it has come to be known, is most active, a number of university student groups have passed motions sanctioning Israel, which have been quickly dismissed as merely symbolic by university administrations.

In the malls, shoppers have remained largely immune to the call to boycott products made in Israel, on either side of the Green Line. Meanwhile, economic and academic ties between Canada and Israel grow annually.

Tyler Levitan, campaigns co-ordinator for Independent Jewish Voices, which supports sanctions against Israel, agrees that it appears as if BDS has made little headway in Canada. But that may not be the campaign's aim.

"At the practical level of threats to the Israeli economy, it hasn't reached that level," he said. "Education-wise, it is very effective. It gets people to talk about the issue, how Israel is violating Palestinian human rights."

The BDS movement in Canada remains decentralized, with no overarching co-ordinating body or charismatic leadership. (Among the groups that promote BDS are Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East, which declined an interview, and the Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid, which did not respond to requests for an interview.)

But while the movement seems to be loosely organized, it has been able to drive and dominate debate, especially on university campuses, which leaves Jews and Israel's supporters infuriated.

"We can be really cynical [and think] it's the first step, to use propaganda to really boycott Israel or is it simply a PR campaign to create anger about Israel," said Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada, an Israel advocacy organization.

"Thousands of students leave university not knowing anything about Israel except that it must be terrible because the student union boycotted it," Kates said.

Sara Saber-Freedman, executive vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, agrees that BDS has not had much impact on Israel's economy or its academic institutions.

"It's really a propaganda tool to give their rank and file something concrete to do. It allows them to make a lot of noise that is very disturbing to the pro-Israel and Jewish community."

BDS first emerged as a strategy at the now infamous UN anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, in 2001. It was formally endorsed by dozens of Palestinian unions and human rights groups in 2005.

Jewish and Israel advocacy groups have unequivocally opposed the campaign, arguing that peace needs to be negotiated by Israel and the Palestinians, without outside pressures, and they say the campaign delegitimizes the very existence of the State of Israel.

In Canada, the campaign has mainly been promoted by university student groups, unions and churches.

In 2012, the United Church of Canada made headlines when it voted to ask its members to boycott goods produced by three companies with factories in the West Bank. Church leaders have been at pains to point out that while the ongoing campaign, called Unsettling Goods, called for an economic boycott, it was not a blanket call for sanctions against Israel.

The boycott was one prong of a campaign that asked church members to lobby the Canadian government to require that Israeli goods made in the West Bank be labelled as such and to engage in "courageous conversations" about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, said Patti Talbot, the United Church's team leader for global partnerships.

The campaign will be re-evaluated at the church's general conference this summer, but even within the liberal confines of the United Church, Canada's largest Christian denomination, it has been slow to catch on.

"It's taken much longer than anticipated to get a sense of what individuals and congregations need and what's helpful," Talbot said.

As a result, the church has introduced new materials for its members to combat "deeply held stereotypes," among them that the boycott call is anti-Semitic, Talbot said.

But the greatest impact has been on university campuses, where BDS votes have been approved, often under disputed circumstances, at 11 universities.

University administrations, however, have been quick to dismiss the votes as meaningless. In the summer of 2013, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada signed a five-year agreement strengthening research ties with their Israeli counterparts.

"We fight it [BDS] by encouraging university presidents to visit Israel, by encouraging investment, by encouraging trade agreements," Saber-Freedman said.

On the funding front, BDS advocates are at a distinct disadvantage, Levitan noted.

"Universities have strong ties to Israel, in part due to lobbying efforts of pro-Israel advocates on the administration," he said. "Student clubs get some funding, there's some money in the community, but it pales to funds available from Israel lobbying groups. It's not a level playing field."

Still, the noisy campaigns on campus are disquieting at the very least, often using violent imagery and making Jewish students feel vulnerable. Meanwhile, pro-Israel groups need to tread carefully as they combat BDS campaigns, lest they be accused of violating freedom of speech or trampling on academic independence, Saber-Freedman said.

Standing up for inclusion of all

Justine Apple

It was welcome news for our Kulanu Toronto community when, at the end of February, we heard that Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) had disbanded.

The gay Pride Parade was created 45 years ago as an inclusive event that would be welcoming and accepting of everyone. Since 2008, QuAIA has hovered like a dark cloud over the Pride Parade, turning the event from a celebration of LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender) rights into a vehicle to deliver anti-Israel propaganda. QuAIA's hateful banners and signs demonizing Israel served to abandon Pride's inclusive philosophy. They created divisiveness and tarnished the good reputation of the parade.

Since QuAIA's arrival on the scene, many Kulanu Toronto members have felt excluded from Pride, fearing they would be harassed and singled out for supporting the State of Israel. Suddenly, Pride no longer felt safe or welcoming. Isn't it ironic that Israel, the only democracy for LGBT people in an otherwise hostile Middle East, was singled out by QuAIA? They could have played a meaningful role if their members had focused their energies on speaking out against actual abuses against our LGBT community, such as in Iran, where people are executed for being gay.

From the start, QuAIA's divisive mantra became a huge source of contention for members of the Jewish and LGBT communities. For six years, Kulanu Toronto and our allies worked diligently to further marginalize them at the parade. Each year, QuAIA members found themselves placed further and further back in the parade lineup. Last year at World Pride, they were one of the last groups to march. They were removed from the spotlight, and no one was paying attention to them. Their small contingent was met with silence.

As QuAIA's presence at Pride shrunk and ultimately withered away, Kulanu Toronto has been standing up for Israel. We succeeded in galvanizing hundreds in the Jewish community – straight and gay – to march with us. In 2010, we had an overwhelming 500 people march in our contingent, including families and synagogue members from Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal and Ottawa. We marched together to demonstrate our unwavering support for Israel as the only gay-friendly, pluralistic democracy in the Middle East. We marched to ensure that anti-Semitism would not be tolerated. The support and good wishes from our community were incredible, and we thank everyone who has stood at our side over the years.

Kulanu Toronto is not at all surprised that QuAIA disbanded. They garnered far more attention than they ever deserved. Over time, they became irrelevant, and their hate was drowned out by messages of inclusivity and celebration.

We must be cautious, however, when celebrating the disbanding of QuAIA. Sadly, people so obsessed with hating Israel never really go away. We all know that these anti-Israel activists are this generation's face of viral anti-Semitism and intolerance. No matter what your affiliation in the Jewish community or how you identify in the LGBT community, we all need to stand together in solidarity against them.

Unlike QuAIA, Kulanu Toronto is here to stay! Last year, at World Pride, we had 150 people in our delegation, including a group of LGBT Israelis. We danced to the beat of an Israeli DJ who played on our Tel Aviv beach-themed graffiti float. In the spirit of inclusivity and acceptance, we held Jewish and pro-Israel signs that said, "Israel: world leader in gay rights" and "Tel Aviv: gay capital of the Middle East." Receptive spectators clapped and cheered as they read our Kulanu signs that said, "One in every minyan" and "I knished a girl and I liked it."

We can't wait to march at Pride Parade again on Sunday, June 28. We invite all of you – straight, gay, families and individuals – to join us as we stand up for diversity, respect and acceptance. ■

Should we unmask poverty?

Daniel Held

By late Purim afternoon, I had heard the megillah, distributed mishloach manot baskets and eaten the Purim meal. The final mitzvah to be done was matanot le'evyonim – gifts to the poor. Purim is the only day of the year on which we are specifically required to give charity to the poor. The requirement that the money be received by the poor on the day of Purim itself means that our usual ways of giving charity to the poor – through contributions to UJA Federation, Mazon or local food drives – do not suffice.

Normally on Purim, I make a donation to a collective pot in shul, which someone then distributes later that day to those in need. This year, because it was so late in the day, we were concerned we had missed our opportunity. As we began considering how we could distribute the charity ourselves, we realized just how sheltered we are from poverty. While we occasionally see someone asking for money on a street corner, living in the suburbs poverty is hidden.

But poverty does exist on Bathurst Street. In Toronto, more that 24,000 Jews or 12.9 per cent of the community lives under the low income cut-off (LICO) – a Statistics Canada-determined income rate pegged at $35,000 for a family of four.

It's a beautiful thing to give anonymously. Distancing the donor from the recipient benefits both. For the recipient, it offers shelter from the embarrassment of asking for and receiving help. For the donor, it enhances the altruistic act of giving, forcing charity to be for the benefit of the recipient rather than the giver. We teach young children the value of this form of giving through Maimonides' ladder of tzedakah, which values the anonymity of giving and receiving.

As a classroom teacher, I knew there were students in my classes who lived on the edge of poverty. In addition to tuition assistance, the community provided them with books, the cost of trips and supplies and, for some, with shoes for gym class. But I never knew who was on the list. For our classrooms to operate and for the benefit of the social and emotional learning in our schools, it was critical that we treated these issues with anonymity. The mask of poverty allowed these students to flourish.

At the same time, the mask can be harmful to our community, diminishing the perceived need and hindering our ability to enact change. It's easy to feel passionate about a cause that you can see, touch, feel and understand. TV ads for starving children in Africa are prime examples, tugging at our heartstrings and encouraging us to give. Because we mask poverty, it's easy for it to become a set of numbers and statistics, devoid of humanity, character, and impact.

Between 2001 and 2011, the number of Toronto Jews living under the LICO line grew by four thousand individuals. Each has his own name and story, but will likely remain anonymous. If we knew their stories, would we feel more passionate and more motivated to end poverty in our community?

On Purim afternoon, after wondering where I could give charity directly to a poor person, I found someone who added my money to the communal pot. I pooled my charity with that of others, safeguarding my anonymity and that of the recipient, but at the same distancing myself from the face and reality of poverty.

I don't know the answer. On one hand, I believe that anonymity of giving raises the quality of the charitable act. At the same time, however, I believe we won't be able to make headway on the growing issue of poverty until we are able to more intimately see the face of the issue. ■

Israel's gap in Judaic studies

Jean M. Gerber

Rabbi David Golinkin, renowned halachist and president of the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, is a man with a mission: bridge the chasm between dati (religious) and chiluni (secular) in Israel. He began as a pulpit rabbi in the Conservative movement in Israel, but experience soon changed his life goal.

Recently in Vancouver, he explained what started him on this quest, and how he is going about it. He began with a story.

Standing in the security line at Ben Gurion airport, he showed his ID to the young woman standing guard.

"What kind of professor are you?' she asked.

"Talmud," he replied.

Her answer: "What is Talmud?"

The woman had gone through the Israeli secular school system, yet never heard of Talmud. Had she studied any Jewish material in school? Yes, but it "wasn't important. Who remembers?"

These and other encounters led Rabbi Golinkin to realize that from the pulpit, he could do little to change this imbalance. Young secular Israelis who had matured in the secular school system knew nothing of Jewish religion, culture or Bible, let alone Talmud.

"And whose fault is this?" he asked our congregation rhetorically. The founders of the state! Golda Meir, David Ben-Gurion, had allowed exemption for haredi yeshiva students from the army, and at the same time, created two school systems, the secular and the religious.

Since then, even the small amount of time in the secular schools devoted to Bible has been cut in half.

In an online interview with him I continued the discussion.

What to do? First came the TALI schools with enhanced Jewish studies programs, now 94 schools and 166 preschools, reaching 40,000 children – over 10 per cent of the public elementary schools and five per cent of preschools. But still, how many children can you reach outside this system, especially given the meagre level of government support.

So, Rabbi Golinkin has begun to train teachers and administrators who will go on to work in the public system.

The Schechter Institute's master's program for Israeli teachers has more than 600 students and 1,360 graduates. They spread out across the country, working to influence, or infiltrate, if you will, the secular system from the inside.

What is the biggest hurdle? Money. The funding for TALI has always been an issue. It is now one million shekels ($250,000), only 10 per cent of TALI's budget. Needless to say, every minister in charge of education, no matter the party, has had to be convinced that such an odd duck as TALI should receive equitable funding.

I note here that the late Zevulun Hammer was impressed with what TALI is doing, although his successors have been less friendly – to say the least.

What, I asked, are the chances that a new Israeli government, any new Israeli government, would be more favourable to increasing support for this endeavour?

"Very doubtful," he replied. "Likud and Labor do not care about pluralistic Jewish education. Yesh Atid (Yair Lapid's party) cares, but it's not clear if they will be in the government."

Over the years, we have lived in and visited Israel. We have seen first-hand a growing antagonism between sectors of Israeli society: the resentment, not to say hatred, of the secular who serve in the army toward the haredi who sit at home; the antagonism of the haredi for modern Orthodox; results of this total separation of systems, which continues to widen the gulf; a society that seems unable (or unwilling) to mediate among the factions.

Why should we care? What we need now, Rabbi Golinkin writes, is a "'Jewish revolution,' and that revolution must adopt itself to the Israeli reality."

He quotes Holocaust survivor Aharon Appelfeld: "A society without true roots is a society without a future." If the secular Israeli does not, cannot know about the rich culture of Judaism, what will anchor the society such ignorance creates? ■

Liberal democracy cannot be imposed from outside

Paul Michaels

Why is it that just about everything the United States tries in the Middle East turns to dust?

With the region – from Libya in North Africa to Yemen in the Arabian Peninsula – undergoing cataclysmic upheavals, can the United States, over the past decade or even longer, point to one policy achievement?

Its policy failures are not just President Barack Obama's, but became evident under president George W. Bush with his 2003 invasion of Iraq, motivated by the misconceived – if idealistic – notion that the U.S. could bring democracy to that country and beyond.

That policy was an abject failure in human lives, those of both American soldiers and Iraqi civilians, in the waste of more than a trillion American dollars, and in the vivid proof it provided that implanting genuine liberal democracy (more than mere elections) is simply illusory.

By displacing the Sunni-led dictatorship of Iraq's Saddam Hussein, the Bush-led U.S. inadvertently opened the door to Shia Iranian influence in that country. This process has recently accelerated dramatically as American armed forces, now under Obama, have formed – denials notwithstanding – a tacit alliance with Iranian forces and Iranian-backed Shia-dominated Iraqi forces to fight the Islamic State (ISIS).

In enabling Iran to extend its tentacles deep into Iraq at a time when Tehran has aggressive designs on the region – from Lebanon to Yemen – the U.S. has, however unwittingly, opened a Pandora's Box, inflaming the historic conflict between Sunnis and Shia – much to the alarm of Sunni Arab states, mainly Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, which are America's traditional allies.

Following Obama's 2009 speech in Cairo, when he attempted to re-set anti-American attitudes in the Arab and Muslim world stemming from Bush's failed war in Iraq, Obama was determined to prove that his country was not at war with Islam.

Accordingly, when the "Arab spring" first emerged in 2010-2011, Obama placed his cards with the Muslim Brotherhood, which had prevailed in the Egyptian elections. The administration assumed that, because the Brotherhood had been "democratically elected," it would govern democratically under President Mohammed Morsi. That was yet another failed assumption. Morsi proved not only incompetent but also even more repressive, anti-democratic and intolerant of minorities' rights than former president Hosni Mubarak and his military-backed regime.

Let's not forget that it was "liberal" Egyptians at the forefront of overthrowing Mubarak, who subsequently demanded that the army remove Morsi from power – although, unfortunately, they, too, went on to suffer under Egypt's new military strongman Abdel Fattah al Sisi.

America's traditional allies in the region were dismayed by what they saw as American naiveté in putting faith in the Brotherhood, even as the Saudi monarchs support puritanical Wahhabi religious authorities from whom groups like ISIS derive inspiration.

With the possible exception of Tunisia (at least for now), the "democracy deficit" in that region, whether governed under monarchies, the military or Islamic rule, is something that only the Arabs themselves can change, and that will mean challenging deeply entrenched patriarchal, tribal and Islamic-dominant traditions where there's no real separation between "mosque and state." Liberal democracy is not something that can be imposed or even infused from the outside

In the meantime, with its high birthrate, increasing "youth bulge" and extremely poor economic development, the Arab world lurches toward more instability where extremist Islamists like ISIS, Al Qaeda, and others fill the gap, offering disaffected youth both job prospects and a sense of purpose.

The United States aims to "defeat" ISIS but even if it manages to achieve this, what comes after? Yet another radical Sunni group in its place?

Arguably far more dangerous, if less "frightening" on the surface than ISIS, Iran gains more influence in the entire region, to say nothing of what its pursuit of nuclear weapons and ensuing proliferation means – for both Israel and the Gulf States.

As this column appears, one day after the Israeli elections, it will be interesting to see how the Jewish state – the rare island of stability surrounded by havoc – manages to safely navigate its way. ■

Jewish groups rap Trudeau for 'none is too many' remarks

plungen@thecjn.ca

Jewish community groups say federal Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau went too far in invoking Canada's Nazi-era exclusionary immigration policies when he criticized the Harper government's citizenship swearing-in policy.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) called the remark inappropriate and inaccurate, while B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) also chided him.

His political opponents in the Conservative party weighed in as well, with Defence Minister Jason Kenney calling Trudeau's comments "outrageous and beyond the pale."

Trudeau ignited the attacks in a speech to McGill University alumni in Toronto March 9 when he compared Canadian Muslims to the Jews of the 1930s, slamming the Harper government for what he called a policy of exclusion and of sowing fear.

"We should all shudder to hear the same rhetoric that led to a 'none is too many' immigration policy towards Jews in the '30s and '40s being used to raise fears against Muslims today," Trudeau said.

Later in the speech, he attacked the Harper government for appealing a court decision allowing a Muslim woman to wear a face-covering niqab during a citizenship swearing-in ceremony. Harper had said most Canadians would consider it offensive that someone would conceal their identity at the moment they become a citizen.

It's not the business of government to tell women what to wear or to restrict their religious freedom, Trudeau stated in his speech, whose theme was liberty.

"It is a cruel joke to claim you are liberating people from oppression by dictating in law what they can and cannot wear. We all know what is going on here. It is nothing less than an attempt to play on people's fears and foster prejudice, directly toward the Muslim faith. This is not the spirit of Canadian liberty, my friends. It is the spirit of the Komagata Maru. Of the St. Louis. Of 'none is too many.'"

The Komagata Maru incident took place in 1914 when a Japanese ship sailing from India with prospective Asian immigrants was turned away from Vancouver.

The SS St. Louis was a ship sailing from Germany in 1939 with 937 refugees fleeing the Nazis. It was refused entry to Canada, the United States and Cuba. It returned to Europe. It's estimated that 254 passengers were killed in the Holocaust.

"None is too many" refers to a statement by a senior Canadian immigration official in 1945 commenting on the number of Jews that should be allowed into the country.

CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel said that in arguing against racism and prejudice, "Mr. Trudeau invoked a dark chapter in our history," but he added: "The comparison is unfortunate, distracting from the important message he was trying to convey. We view this comparison as inaccurate and inappropriate, and we will communicate that sentiment to Mr. Trudeau's office.

"Canada's decision to restrict Jewish immigration prior to the Holocaust was the product of an era in which Jews faced extensive social and institutional discrimination in Canada ...In contrast... discrimination today is rightly countered – rather than fostered – by the vast majority of Canadians. This includes discrimination experienced by Muslims who, like all minority groups, unfortunately face a degree of prejudice from some elements of Canadian society."

Fogel noted that the government "has appropriately and consistently distinguished between marginal, extreme, terrorist elements of the Muslim community and the broader Muslim community."

Kenney told Maclean's magazine that comparing "anti-Semitic immigration restrictions during the Holocaust to a request that people take the public citizenship oath publicly demonstrates a grotesque lack of judgment ... The facts profoundly belie everything [Trudeau] said... This is a government that has maintained the highest immigration levels in our history since coming to office – almost 300,000 Muslims have immigrated to Canada."

He called the reference to the Holocaust "bizarre and contemptible."

B'nai Brith Canada CEO Michael Mostyn also called those remarks "inappropriate and offensive," adding: "Such language is divisive... We must find the balance between freedom and security without resorting to inaccurate historical parallels that have no bearing on reality."

FSWC CEO Avi Benlolo said that "tossing the Holocaust into a political debate is concerning. It was a careless metaphor that could easily lead to divisiveness and friction between communities."

None of the groups censured remarks, however, by Public Security Minister Stephen Blaney, who on March 10 invoked the Holocaust to support the government's proposed anti-terror bill. Appearing before a committee studying the bill, he said "the Holocaust did not begin in the gas chamber, it began with words," and that the proposed law would protect Canadians from a "jihadist threat."

NDP MP Randall Garrison called the comment "overinflated rhetoric" and said "there is no equivalence to anything we're talking about here today to the Holocaust."

Fogel later defended Blaney, to a point.

"Considering the genocidal statements issued by [Iran] calling quite literally for a new Holocaust targeting Jews, and the actions of ISIL along with their pronouncements, any discussion about the rationale for legislation that would address such language and its potential toxic influence is not entirely out of place," Fogel said. "That said, politicians run an obvious risk when they invoke the Holocaust in policy debates, and we generally think that such references are best avoided, as they distract from the issues at hand." ■

Canada, Israel join forces to aid Ukrainian agriculture

plungen@thecjn.ca

Canada and Israel are relying on a Mennonite NGO to deliver agricultural know-how to Ukraine in a multilevel project that builds on a strategic partnership launched last year during Prime Minister Stephen Harper's visit to Israel.

Late last month, representatives of Canada and Israel met in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, to sign a memorandum of understanding (MOU) to assist farmers and small and medium-sized business owners in a "Ukraine Horticulture Business Development Project." The signing was witnessed by Okeksiy Pavlenko, Ukraine's minister of agrarian policy and food.

According to the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa, the project will see the provision of equipment and training by Canadian and Israeli experts to assist local Ukrainian farmers. Other aspects of the project include the establishment of credit facilities to help farmers access capital to grow their investments, assistance to Ukrainian agricultural institutions to develop courses in "efficient and environmentally sustainable management of small farms," as well as sharing expertise in growing, storage and marketing of agricultural products.

The project is also designed to help train gardening professionals and, according to the Israeli Embassy, "special attention is paid to female farmers and small entrepreneurs who face challenges to the technical development of their businesses due to a lack of funds."

The project will deliver agricultural expertise in four regions of south Ukraine – Zaporizhya, Mikolaye, Odessa and Kherson – all of them fairly close to the breakaway Crimean peninsula.

"Canada is steadfast in its commitment to helping advance democracy, strengthen human rights and support sustainable economic growth in Ukraine," said Christian Paradis, minister of international development and La Francophonie.

"Our support for this project, in collaboration with the government of Israel, will help Ukrainian farmers and small and medium sized businesses move from poverty to prosperity," Paradis said.

"This agreement is another example of how Canada and Israel can leverage mutual expertise to help make the world a better place," said Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak. "International development is one of the key areas of co-operation – in addition to energy, security, scientific research and academic ties – that were highlighted in the Canada-Israel Strategic Partnership MOU signed last year during Prime Minister Stephen Harper's historic visit to Israel."

At the time the agreement was signed in January 2014, Harper touted the MOU as laying out "a strategic direction for stronger future relations between our two countries in commerce, innovation, energy, security, international aid and development, and the promotion of human rights globally."

Canada is allocating more than $19 million to the project, from 2014 through 2021. As many as 30,000 Ukrainian farmers are expected to benefit.

A key partner in project implementation will be Israel's Agency for International Development Co-operation, MASHAV, which will provide the experts in project training and capacity-building activities while supporting the development of an apprenticeship program for Ukrainian agricultural college students.

The project is being implemented by MEDA, the Mennonite Economic Development Associates of Canada. MEDA is an international economic development organization founded in 1953 by Mennonite business professionals whose mission is to create business solutions to poverty. ■

Ontario Court orders fake "doctors" of Chinese medicine to stop practising

The Ontario Superior Court has ordered unlicensed practitioners of traditional Chinese medicine to stop practising, ruling they broke Ontario's health laws.

The unlicensed practitioners also set up a number of organizations which they illegally held out to be provincially-mandated regulatory bodies. The only legal regulatory body in Ontario is the College of Traditional Chinese Medicine Practitioners and Acupuncturists of Ontario, (CTCMPAO).

The ban makes permanent an interim injunction that ordered the unlicensed practitioners to cease practising in June, 2014. In a multi-page decision released February 6th, Mr. Justice Mew wrote:

"The respondents are, or have been until restrained by the interim injunction, breaking the law. They must stop doing so. Whether they like it or not, the College is carrying out a regulatory function under statutory authority. The Divisional Court has decided that the regulations which the College seeks to enforce…are constitutional."

The ruling means that patients who choose traditional Chinese medicine have the right to be treated by only those practitioners licensed and qualified to practise the profession in Ontario.

"The ruling is clear: it means that obeying the laws that govern health professionals in Ontario is not optional. It means that professional standards and licensing rules apply to practitioners of traditional Chinese medicine in Ontario, just as they apply to physicians, dentists, nurses, psychologists and all the other regulated health professions in the province", says College Registrar Cristina De Caprio.

The colleges that govern regulated health professions have been established to ensure that properly licensed members adhere to standards of care in the interests of public safety.

"The issue here is protection of the public. We welcome the court decision against these medical 'outlaws', who have been brazen in falsely holding themselves out as qualified doctors of traditional Chinese medicine", adds the Registrar, who urges members of the public to check the College's public registry to ensure they are seeing a licensed practitioner, at http://tcmpao.asicanada.net/imis15/registry .

The individuals in question have knowingly refused to meet the standards required for Chinese medicine practitioners in Ontario, have illegally referred to themselves as "doctor" and have repeatedly ignored the law.

In addition, some of the individuals have established and are associated with various organizations that have illegally pretended to be legitimate regulators of traditional Chinese medicine, and they have established a bogus registration process that falsely purports to authorize individuals to practise traditional Chinese medicine and acupuncture in Ontario.

"All of this is illegal, and has been declared so by the court. We will continue to seek out and prosecute, in the interests of public safety, any unqualified, unregistered individuals who refuse to obey the health laws of Ontario as they apply to traditional Chinese Medicine and acupuncture", concludes De Caprio.

Health inspection finds problems at Baycrest

plungen@thecjn.ca

A series of Ontario Ministry of Health inspection reports conducted at the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, more commonly known as Baycrest, found instances of physical abuse of residents, wheelchairs and sling lifts tainted with feces, unlocked medication carts and various other violations of health standards.

Responding to the reports, William Reichman, president and CEO of Baycrest, said they reflect isolated incidents that have been addressed and that do not detract from the centre's overall high standards and aggregate top performance as a long term care (LTC) facility.

The ministry reports date from August and October 2014, as well as February 2015. The most recent inspection report is also the most extensive. Issued on Feb. 4, it came after 15 days of inspections by three ministry employees. It reported that on multiple occasions, Baycrest failed to comply with Ontario's Long Term Care Homes Act (LTCHA).

In one case, "resident No. 23" was repeatedly abused by their spouse.

The inspectors also found "two other residents who were not protected from abuse by a staff member," and the report referred to a previous compliance order dated Aug. 25, 2014, meant to prevent further abuse.

The Aug. 25 report found several instances of physical abuse by a Baycrest employee, which were witnessed by a colleague. The report states that "staff member A" physically abused a resident "by pulling his/her arms behind his/her back in a restraining manner and forcing the resident to walk to his/her bedroom without the resident's consent."

Inspectors were told that staff member A on other occasions abused a resident during care by getting on the resident's bed and placing "his/her knee on the resident's hand to prevent the resident from punching him/her."

That same staffer put their knee on another resident's leg "in a forceful manner to prevent him/her from kicking him/her."

The resident was afraid of staff member A, and when the resident "became tense and resisted care, staff member A aggressively shoved the resident to sit forward in the wheelchair when the resident was leaning back in the chair," the report stated.

A different Baycrest employee, identified as "staff member D," also reportedly abused a resident. A third staff member reported concerns to the charge nurse but "nothing had been done about his/her concerns," the inspectors reported.

The inspectors issued a compliance order in August requiring Baycrest to implement a plan to protect its residents from abuse, develop a process to monitor and evaluate the care it provides and ensure that all staff are re-trained in the home's policy of zero tolerance of abuse of residents.

The inspectors noted that Baycrest had been in non-compliance of previous orders to report abuse following inspections in May 2014 and November 2011.

In the February report, inspectors ordered Baycrest to prepare protocols to ensure residents are protected from abuse.

The August 2014 report included a finding by inspectors that wheelchairs were soiled with feces, and a body sling was also soiled with human waste. It reported that an incontinent resident was found with fecal matter on their body.

Reichman acknowledged that on occasion, Baycrest failed to live up the standards it has set for itself.

"These particular events I believe are isolated episodes. That doesn't make them unconcerning, because we dropped the ball in these episodes. But we don't have evidence to suggest they are emblematic of systematic problems at Baycrest," he said.

Reichman said the staff member identified as abusing a resident was let go, as was another staffer who witnessed the incidents, but failed to report it.

"Any time we fail to meet our standards for excellence, we're disappointed in ourselves," he said. "That is a consistent belief system here at Baycrest. Improving and achieving the standards of excellence that the community is entitled to and expects is what drives us. We take these things incredibly seriously. Individual episodes such as those that get documented by compliance reports, by survey visits, by our own collection of data, we put all this together into an aggregated picture of how we are performing as an organization. So we need to be careful when isolated incidents are identified. We need to be careful why they happened, what we can do to prevent them from happening again, and to what extent they might be representative of larger systems issues.

"When you evaluate an organization's performance like Baycrest, you have to look for information from a whole variety of sources. This particular source is important, but it should never be viewed as the sole source."

Reichman pointed to the Senior Quality Leap Initiative, a consortium of 12 high-performing organizations in Canada and the United States that co-operate to improve quality of care for residents.

A 2013 report he provided looked at care outcomes among seven nursing home members. Baycrest was rated second overall in composite score, which looked at elements including mood worsening, pain worsening, proportion of residents who are physically restrained and changes in behaviour.

Reichman said these reports are "the gold standard for how you measure quality in long term care."

There have been shortcomings in performance by individual staff members, he acknowledged, but "that should not be taken as representative of how all staff members perform their jobs. That's as true for Baycrest as for any organization that relies on people.

"We're not perfect. No other organization in health care or probably in any other human endeavour is perfect.

"When something like these events happens... we evaluate why this happened and we take the necessary steps, as we did with the staff member who was a little too physical."

According to Ministry of Health spokesperson David Jensen, the February inspection report found that Baycrest had at that time not yet complied with the ministry's order of August 2014, "and a new compliance order was issued."

"The non-compliance in this case relates to specific residents who were not protected from abuse by a staff member employed by the LTC home," he added.

Responding to that allegation, Reichman said, "If the ministry has arrived at the conclusion that we've been non-compliant with a previous order and we determine that they're correct in that, then we try to best understand why. So what did we miss, what did they ask us to do that we didn't do, and how are we going to make sure that next time this doesn't arise as an issue. And we train our staff, we make sure they fully understand what the compliance orders are, what the rules are and we equip them to be successful."

"I wouldn't draw the conclusion that we ignore ministry compliance orders and that this is systematic. This is one episode.

"We've done a lot of staff training since," he added.

Addressing the issues of cleanliness, Reichman said, "The cleanliness issues were largely ascribed to one staff person, where there were performance issues."

Baycrest is not the only LTC facility to run afoul of statutory requirements. The ministry's inspection program under the LTCHA looks at the facilities and responds to specific complaints. It conducts inspections in 629 LTC homes.

A random sampling from the ministry's website revealed that an inspection of another Toronto seniors home, managed by one of North America's leading providers of seniors accommodation, found issues of cleanliness, though mostly of grime and food splatters, in a January inspection.

A July 2013 report found an instance of a resident complaining that they had been "handled roughly" and hit on the back and that the home's written policy on abuse did not identify programs of training and retraining on the issue.

A September 2012 inspection of another home in Toronto found a resident claimed they had been slapped when they refused treatment.

Other inspections focus on issues such as a written plan of care for each resident, bathing protocols, steps for treating pressure ulcers, safety issues and resident-staff communication systems in place.

Reichman said Baycrest is equipped to readjust its procedures when shortcomings are brought to its attention.

"What's important is that we have a climate here at Baycrest that if we make a mistake, we know we made a mistake, we investigate thoroughly why we've made the mistake, and then we take appropriate action to minimize the risk of the mistake occurring again.

"I am very comfortable, if you look at all the sources of information that talk to us about how Baycrest is doing, that Baycrest is an exceptional organization. But you need to look at all of the data, not just the outlier events that are reported to the ministry under the legislative framework." ■

Family seeks funds for five-year-old's leukemia medicine

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Following the devastating news that her once active, full-of-life, five-year-old granddaughter was diagnosed with cancer, Lana Lewis turned to her community to help fund the costly treatment.

In February, Mya Lewis, a Jewish Russian Community Centre preschool student was diagnosed with acute lymphoblastic leukemia (ALL).

Speaking on behalf of Michelle Lewis, her daughter and Mya's mother, because she was still too emotional about the situation to speak to The CJN, Lewis said in the weeks since her granddaughter was diagnosed with ALL, she started a fundraising campaign through a crowd-funding website called Go Fund Me to help Michelle cope with the loss of her job and the added expenses related to caring for her ailing daughter.

Lewis explained that her 32-year-old daughter, who has been raising Mya without support from Mya's father, had to quit her job as a legal assistant in a crown attorney's office to be able to care for her daughter, who will be undergoing aggressive chemotherapy treatment for the next 3-1/2 years.

Because Michelle's job was a temporary position, she wasn't eligible for a paid medical leave or medical benefits.

In the weeks since Mya was diagnosed with cancer, she's been pulled out of school and admitted to the Hospital for Sick Children, where she is currently undergoing the first stage of her chemotherapy treatment.

"She's very moody, she's very weak. From a very active child... she's just lying down. She's so lethargic," Lewis said.

Lewis said that it wasn't until the end of December that her granddaughter began exhibiting symptoms that doctors had trouble diagnosing.

"About the third week of December, she started complaining about a pain in her ankle," Lewis said.

But when she was taken to a medical centre to be X-rayed, there was nothing abnormal.

"Mya's pain became intermittent... We thought maybe she slipped and hurt her ankle, or bumped into something," Lewis said.

"Then she started complaining that her elbow hurt."

Following an X-ray of her elbow, a doctor told her it was fractured in two places and put a cast on her.

Mya Lewis

"A week later, she complained about pain in her other ankle and other elbow... My daughter thought, something is up. I'm taking her to Sick Kids."

Lewis said the doctors at Sick Kids determined Mya's elbow was not, in fact, fractured and removed the cast.

Even an MRI provided inconclusive results about her condition and doctors suggested she might have a form of arthritis that can afflict children as a result of a virus.

After she was given a prescription anti-inflammatory, in the hope her pain was the result of arthritis, the pain continued to worsen.

It wasn't until Mya had a bone marrow test that she was finally diagnosed with ALL.

"It felt liked they dropped a bomb on us," Lewis said.

Mya started her chemotherapy treatment soon after her diagnosis.

Lewis said that although chemotherapy is covered by OHIP, the additional drugs she is prescribed are not covered without a drug plan.

"The trips alone to the hospital – it's parking, it's driving there and if there are no complications, it's at least 60 trips [to the hospital] in the first year."

The Go Fund Me site that Lewis created in February – called Fighting to Save Mya's Life, www.gofundme.com/md9gj4 – has raised about half of its $50,000 goal.

"Our main goal is to save Mya's life and we are desperately trying to do that. Any help is greatly appreciated," Lewis wrote on the site. ■

Exhibit features art by young adults with special needs

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

DANI's second annual Art and Music Night invites the community to experience an exhibition of artworks by young adults with special needs inspired by Russian composer Modest Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

The March 24 event, to be held at the DANI Centre in Thornhill, will consist of an audio-visual art gallery experience followed by a musical jazz performance. There will also be a silent auction of participants' artwork and light refreshments.

In 1874, Mussorgsky composed his famous Pictures at an Exhibition, based on 10 drawings and watercolours produced by his deceased friend, architect and artist Victor Hartmann. Most of the works that inspired the composer have been lost, destroyed or have yet to be discovered.

The gallery will feature a traditional art exhibit.

"We are turning the centre into an art gallery setting where members of the community will be able to participate in an authentic art gallery viewing," said Ashleigh Molinaro, programming co-ordinator and community connections lead.

Ashleigh Molinaro, left, and Anna Gruzman, art department heads at DANI, hold an auction item from last year's art show, a hand-designed and hand-sewn quilt. Each participant created a square.

The exhibit will have a French theme, with a fountain placed in the centre and booths surrounding it.

DANI is a not-for-profit organization that provides support to young adults with developmental disabilities including autism, Down syndrome, cerebral palsy and global developmental delays. It teaches life and social skills while offering a stimulating and fun educational environment.

> We spend a few months creating a beautiful quilt where each patch belongs to one participant and the representation of their feelings on the piece of music

The 25 participating students, all in their 20s, will be sporting French artist outfits to showcase their artwork. They've been working on their pieces in a weekly two-hour class since last September.

"We call it an art and music class. I try to involve and incorporate as many life skills topics that I can. It is a very interdisciplinary class," said program co-ordinator Anna Gruzman.

The exhibition will be divided into 10 "movements," similar to how a long piece of music, such as a symphony or concerto, is divided into movements.

"Every movement is dealing with a different theme, painting, setting, and country. We talk about different cultures and languages. We also learn musical concepts, including musical terminology. Activities include dancing to the music and discussing how it makes us feel and why the composer chose different instruments from the orchestra," explained Gruzman.

One of the highlights of the evening will be the auctioning of a hand-made quilt.

"We spend a few months creating a beautiful quilt where each patch belongs to one participant and the representation of their feelings on the piece of music," Molinaro said.

"A lucky person gets to take it home. It usually sells for hundreds of dollars and is one of our best-sellers, with proceeds going directly to DANI for future art programming."

Cost for the evening is a free-will donation, similar to many other art galleries, with a suggested donation of $5. ■

JCT event honours Oliver

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN

An Israeli school that integrates ultra-Orthodox Jews into the workforce held its primary fundraising event of the year last week in an evening that saw Finance Minister Joe Oliver receive an honorary degree.

"We are here tonight to support a revolutionary economic and social change," said Larry Krauss, chair of the Canadian Friends of the Jerusalem College of Technology (JCT), at the March 12 fundraiser, at Toronto's Ritz-Carlton hotel. "This is the most significant story unfolding in Israel today."

JCT, sometimes known by its original name, Machon Lev, has about 5,000 students in six programs. While its offerings run from business to nursing, the school's high-tech tracks have garnered special acclaim. In recent years, the Orthodox school's programs for haredim, or the ultra-Orthodox, have drawn attention for reducing their social and economic marginalization.

More than 400 guests attended the event, where in addition to Oliver's honour, three Toronto women received Awards of Merit: philanthropists Toby Feldberg and Honey Sherman, and Judith Shamian, president of the International Council of Nurses.

David Anisman, a longtime supporter of the group, was also honoured, in time for his 100th birthday next month.

The female-dominated award slate reflected the evening's fundraising goal: a campus for one of JCT's women's programs, Machon Tal (Tal Campus). Currently renting facilities in Givat Shaul, it will move to permanent quarters in Bayit VeGan, near the school's main campus in neighbouring Givat Mordechai, all in Jerusalem.

The event raised almost $1 million for the 4.5-acre campus, which is a "five-year project," said Friends CEO Simmy Zieleniec.

Advancement of women is a key goal for the technology-focused institution.

"When STEM [science, technology, engineering and mathematics] education for women was not yet in vogue, JCT pioneered engineering and management programs for women that have advanced a generation of women into leadership positions in many sectors of the Israeli economy," JCT president Chaim Sukenik told the audience.

Last year, the school launched TVUNA, which grants degrees in computer science to Yiddish-speaking haredi women. And two weeks ago, 30 women received their MBAs from the school's Lustig Institute, which serves the haredi community.

At times, the evening resembled a reunion of the Conservative party. Laureen Harper, wife of Prime Minister Stephen Harper, was scheduled to speak, but cancelled at the last minute. Defence Minister Jason Kenney, who had previously received an honorary degree from JCT, toasted Oliver, as did John Baird, who recently stepped down as foreign minister.

Baird, who received his own honorary degree in 2012, introduced Oliver, but he also reminisced about being given the opportunity "to change" Canadian policy in the Middle East. He departed the podium as a montage of pro-Israel and pro-Jewish photos flashed on the screen, accompanied by Bruce Springsteen's song Glory Days.

Oliver, who is Jewish, acknowledged Baird's pro-Israel bona fides by recalling a conversation with Baird on a flight home from China. "John was facing me, with a large pile of newspapers on his tray… As he scrolled through the papers, he pointed to a picture of himself standing beside a distinguished rabbi, an Israeli politician, a group of yeshiva students," Oliver recounted.

"'See? There's John Baird. He cares. Where is Joe Oliver? I guess he doesn't care.' On and on it went, until finally he came across my picture – a paid ad."

Ribbing aside, Oliver burnished his own pro-Israel credentials, linking the Jewish state's battles with its neighbours to Canada's struggles with militant Islam.

"Israel is on the front line, the vanguard of civilization against the barbarians," he said. "The friendship between Israel and Canada has thus never been more important."

Domestically, he pointed to Bill C-51 and to his request that the House of Commons finance committee study terrorist financing as examples of the government's commitment to fighting terrorism.

He also echoed the response of Jewish groups to Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, who last week referenced Canada's "none is too many" policy on Jewish immigration during the 1930s and '40s while criticizing the government's attitudes toward Muslims.

"To believe that our stand against terrorism is even remotely comparable to the anti-Semitic policies of a former Liberal government… is an insult to the memory of the victims, to Holocaust survivors and to their families," Oliver said. "I condemn his comments unequivocally." ■

Jordan Freedman will bike from Toronto to Halifax to raise money and awareness for the illness that took his mother's life.

To raise awareness about the disease that severely weakened his mother's muscles and later took her life, Jordan Freedman, 22, wanted to do something that would "push [his] body to its limits."

"People with rare diseases, with cancer, don't have the chance to do this type of activity," he said of the roughly 2,200-kilometre, month-long bike trip from Toronto to Halifax he'll be embarking on this spring.

Freedman, the youngest of three siblings, lives in Thornhill, Ont., with his father and older brother and studies civil engineering at the University of Toronto.

He is calling the trip Journey for Janice, for his mother Janice Freedman, who died in April 2012. She suffered from polymyositis, a rare, chronic inflammatory disease that causes muscle weakness.

The purpose of Freedman's trip, which will take place from May 24 to approximately June 16, is to honour his mother's memory and raise both awareness of and funds for polymyositis and other neuromuscular disorders.

"She first got sick in January 2011 and was in the hospital until about March before they could figure out what she had," Freedman explained. "That's part of the reason I want to get the word out about these diseases."

All donations will go directly to Muscular Dystrophy Canada, a national voluntary agency committed to eliminating neuromuscular disorders, which will help Freedman by setting him up with jerseys that read "Journey for Janice" and connecting him to people working with the organization along the way and in the Halifax area.

Freedman's best friend, Hartley Ruch, 21, will be accompanying him to Halifax by car, and their plan is to clock an average of 115 kilometres each day, doing four consecutive days and having a rest day on the fifth.

"The plan is that every five to 10 kilometres we'll meet up," Freedman said. "We'll have a two-way radio set to make sure we're on the same route, and when I catch up to him, I'll either give him the thumbs up that I'm good to keep going or thumbs down that I want to stop and will grab some water and food from the car."

To further support the cause, Ruch will be running an average of 5 km each day, with the ultimate goal of completing 100 km.

The Journey for Janice project is profiled on the Muscular Dystrophy Canada website, where it is soliciting donations. The trip has already raised $3,000, with the ultimate goal of reaching $25,000.

To help with food, gas and accommodation costs en route, Freedman has found several companies willing to sponsor him.

Throughout the trip, he and Ruch will stay with friends of friends or people they connect to through online communities like Warmshowers.org, a free, worldwide hospitality exchange for cyclists on the road.

And, just in case, they'll be bringing camping gear, Freedman said, and will consider the odd night in a motel or hotel, "to get a few good sleeps."

The two will be seeking donations in cash, cheque or through their website, and will use social media, as well as a daily blog, to let people know where they are and how they're doing.

Freedman has spent the last few months training at an indoor facility, but once the weather warms up, he will begin training outdoors. He noted that he's gotten a lot of positive feedback about the trip so far, and that people are extremely impressed by what he's taking on.

"People sometimes don't hear me and think I'm just going to be biking in Halifax," he said, "but then they're kind of in shock when they hear the distance [I'm actually biking]."

Freedman has always been a passionate cyclist, and has long been interested in biking for charitable causes. In the last few years, he's biked from Toronto to Niagara Falls as part of the Ride to Conquer Cancer.

Though she wasn't herself a cyclist, before his mother got sick, Freedman said, she would often take evening walks with his dad or with friends.

"There are many reasons why this trip came together," he said. "I wanted to do something special for my mom and her rare condition, and at the same time, I wanted to embrace my passion for biking and complete something great. So naturally, I came up with this idea." ■

Nefesh B'Nefesh aliyah fair helps smooth immigration

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Rent or buy? Change careers? What about schools? Health care? Salaries and pensions?

The questions – and answers – were many at the annual Nefesh B'Nefesh aliyah fair March 10, where some 120 residents of Toronto and environs came to the Novotel Hotel in North York to explore the prospect of moving to Israel.

They came to pick the brains of experts on housing, taxes, financial planning, retiring and myriad other details on easing into life in Israel. The annual fair hosted vendors from Israeli universities, law firms, real estate agencies and even an Orthodox retirement community.

Even though moving to Israel is, for many, the fulfilment of a dream or ideal, it can be daunting, according to the breakout workshops and seminars.

Marc Rosenberg, the 38-year-old U.S.-born director of pre-aliyah for Nefesh B'Nefesh, says "fear of the unknown" is the biggest obstacle facing prospective olim (immigrants).

"Most of them have visited Israel before and know it's a wonderful place to live. They know the weather is great and the people are great," said Rosenberg, who made aliyah 13 years ago.

"What they're wondering is what their life is really going to be like when they go to the supermarket [or] when they send their kids to school. We want to be honest about what's in store for them."

He avoids ideology when selling Israel.

"Weather and lifestyle are definitely a big attraction," Rosenberg told The CJN, "and obviously the Jewish atmosphere."

For Canadians, "a natural shift" is seen in Israel's national health care system, he added. Part of the package greeting olim is free basic health care for the first year; financial assistance worth from $5,800 for singles to $19,000 for a family of five; free university tuition for a bachelor's or master's degree, if eligible; rent and day-care subsidies; free Hebrew language instruction; tax holidays; and a host of other goodies.

But moving to Israel can be challenging, he said, as the country shifts from traditional labour toward a skills-based economy.

"It's difficult to transfer jobs, but not skills," Rosenberg told a session on building your career in Israel. "You have to not see yourselves in rigid categories."

Some 120 people came out to learn about immigrating to Israel. RON CSILLAG PHOTO

He counsels networking, flexibility and learning Hebrew.

On average, it can take six to eight months to land a job in Israel, he said, though some newcomers do it sooner, he said.

The CJN attempted to interview several attendees at the fair. All declined, saying their plans were not yet finalized and they did not want to tip off employers or loved ones.

Founded in 2002, Nefesh B'Nefesh, in co-operation with the Israeli government and the Jewish Agency for Israel, is dedicated to revitalizing aliyah from North America and Great Britain "by removing or minimizing the financial, professional, logistical and social obstacles."

To date, the organization has helped more than 42,000 newcomers immigrate to Israel and sees retention rates of more than 90 per cent.

Last year, 399 Canadians made aliyah, up from 384 the year before. From Toronto, 111 moved to Israel in 2014, an increase from 108 in 2013.

In 1990, at the height of post-Soviet Jewish emigration, 200,000 immigrants came to Israel. By 2013, that figure had declined to just 16,800, according to a recent Times of Israel report.

But aliyah spiked last year, with some 26,500 immigrants arriving, according to the Jewish Agency, with France and Ukraine leading as source countries.

France became the leading source of immigrants for the first time, with almost 7,000 coming in 2014, double the number from 2013, the agency stated. ■

Dancers seek to raise autism awareness

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Inspired by her seven-year-old son who has Asperger's syndrome, Brianne Buckman-Kalechstein has co-ordinated and choreographed a flash mob dance number to be performed at the March 30 Toronto Raptors game to raise awareness about autism spectrum disorder.

"The awareness is there about autism, but there is not a lot of true understanding, and there is not a lot of acceptance yet," said Buckman-Kalechstein, a dance teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

This is the third Autism Acceptance event Buckman-Kalechstein has co-ordinated in recognition of the annual World Autism Awareness Day on April 2, but the first time she has organized the event on such a large scale.

Some 150 dancers from five GTA dance studios – Roland and Romain, York Dance Academy, the Dance Zone, Spotlight Theatre Company, and Evolutions Dance – will perform at the Air Canada Centre at some point during the Raptors' game against the Houston Rockets.

The event, sponsored by Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment (MLSE) and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre, has been in the works for a year.

A portion of every game ticket sold through the dance studios – by the dancers and their family and friends – will support Camp Aim, where Buckman-Kalechstein has worked for five years.

The proceeds will go to the Peers in Play program for children with Asperger's and high-functioning autism at Camp Aim, which caters to children with disorders including autism, cerebral palsy and Down syndrome.

MLSE is giving each dancer a T-shirt that says "autism acceptance" on it, and the cause has been adopted by NBA Cares, the league's community outreach initiative, which promotes important causes such as education, and health and wellness.

Last year, Buckman-Kalechstein worked with local drama and theatre schools and had students recite a poem she wrote about her son, titled Believe In Me. It's meant to break down the stigma associated with Asperger's and autism.

"I don't look different so you may not see, at first why I learn differently," the poem begins.

"At times my behaviour may shock you and you might think that I'm unkind, but please take a moment to enter my mind.

"I want to feel safe. I need to know you care, my behaviours are triggered when structure isn't there.

"Please be patient and discover how I learn. I want to succeed and need to feel secure."

Buckman-Kalechstein said the drama students recorded and photographed themselves reciting the poem, then posted the videos and photos on social media sites.

"This year, I said I need to reach a larger audience, because I feel very strongly about the need for acceptance. The [way the disorder is] diagnosed over the years has changed so many times, and so many children are now on the higher functioning end of the spectrum, and the negative stigma associated with it… it has to stop," she said.

"My goal is for someone to hear the word autism and be understanding."

She recalled that as a toddler, her son would have public meltdowns, which she had to explain to onlookers.

During one outing to the theatre, he spoke to a woman behind the concession stand in the lobby.

The Kalechstein family

"She kept saying how cute he was. When the theatre let out, he got overwhelmed and tried to climb over the counter. I helped him down and turned to her to explain that he has Asperger's, and she greeted me with that pity smile and an 'I'm sorry,'" Buckman-Kalechstein said.

"This is why I do what I do. No 'I'm sorry' needed. My son was simply having a sensory moment. He's still the amazing, adorable kid she was interacting with moments before." ■

Anti-Jewish slurs used in online real estate ads

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

A real estate agent whose name and company were listed at the bottom of several online ads with the taglines "You don't have to be Jewish to buy this house" and "You don't have to be Jewish to rent this house" said they were put up by a third-party company and he had no knowledge the slogans had been used.

Jazz Samra, a sales representative at Homexperts Real Estate Inc. in Brampton, told The CJN he does not endorse the ads, which include listings for three separate Brampton homes for sale and one Mississauga home for rent on the online classified sites Craigslist, Kijiji, Trovit and Mitula.

"I don't review every ad," Samra said. "I've never seen these before... I will make sure that doesn't happen again."

All of the ads appear to have been posted between late February and mid-March.

In a follow-up call with The CJN, Samra said he deleted the ads with the offensive slogans.

Although the ads appeared to have been removed from Kijiji, The CJN was subsequently able to find them on Trovit and Mitula, where they remained as of March 13. On Craigslist, the wording had been changed to "You don't have to be rich to buy this house."

The CJN was notified of the listings by a house-hunter who saw two of the ads on Kijiji.

Two or three years ago, a company called "Coefficients" contacted Samra to offer their ad-posting services, and they have helped him post "thousands of ads over the years," he said.

"Every week, I give them 100 or 150 homes for sale and they take the information and post ads... Sometimes, the people that post them are overseas, in India, Pakistan, the Philippines or Russia."

He said he contacted the company "to see why they did it" and, "if something is wrong there, then for sure I won't work with them anymore."

Homexpert's president and CEO, Moninder Khudal, told The CJN he also had no prior knowledge of the ads and was "extremely, extremely sorry on behalf of my company to all the people who were hurt by this."

He said he complained to the third-party company and is determined to "get to the bottom of it – who the company is, what happened and how."

Khudal said he always gives final approval to ads his sales representatives place in publications such as newspapers and magazines, but said it's difficult to monitor everything that's posted on sites such as Craigslist and Kijiji.

A Kijiji screenshot from March 12. Agent Jazz Samra says a Philippines-based firm posted the offensive language without his prior knowledge.

"This should not have happened," he stressed. "And in future, we'll make sure it won't happen again."

In a March 13 email to Samra from Mary Rose Somera-Cadiente, the Philippines-based managing director of Coefficients, said she wanted to apologize "about the 'accused racist ad titles' that were created by my team. We do not in any way intend to speak ill about Jewish people or create an impression through those ad titles that GTA Homexperts is racist. We do not have anything against Jewish people, and in fact, a number of our clients are Jewish, and we love dealing with them."

She blamed the ads on "our newest employee, who is still undergoing training" and "is still not yet exposed with so much cultural differences and some terms and phrases that might demean other people."

The worker was apologetic and "said that she does not in any way mean to offend our Jewish folks and she honestly thinks that the term 'Jewish' means rich people in general," Somera-Cadiente said."

She added: "Rest assured that this will not happen in the future... we are responsible for this and... GTA Homexperts has nothing to do with this mistake."

Kristina Wilson, a spokesperson for the Real Estate Council of Ontario (RECO), which regulates agents in the province, said she couldn't comment on specific cases for confidentiality reasons. But she said all agents must adhere to a code of ethics that says they must "refrain from any behaviour that could be reasonably regarded as disgraceful, dishonourable, unprofessional or unbecoming. This could include creating advertisements with potentially offensive content."

She added: "The type of situation you have identified is very uncommon, but when it does happen, we take it seriously. We will usually try to educate and work with the registrant to affect change swiftly, but on occasion, we have had to escalate matters to our discipline process." ■

Divorce coach helps keep peace through tough times

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Deborah Moskovitch

Deborah Moskovitch understands divorce, having struggled through her own drawn-out ordeal with a resolution that concluded more than 10 years ago.

The Toronto-based author and divorce coach helps clients move through their divorce more intelligently, with their families and finances intact, while at the same time saving them time and heartache.

"Choosing to leave an 11-year marriage with three young children was a very painful and difficult decision – one that developed into challenge and high conflict," said Moskovitch.

On the heels of her divorce was a legal file that remained opened for seven long years.

"I was going through two different types of divorce: the emotional divorce and the legal divorce," she said. "Once my file closed in 1997, I realized I wanted to explore divorce, understand what makes divorce difficult, tragic, and soul-destroying. Even if it goes well, it's painful and sad."

Armed with a marketing background and an entrepreneurial spirit, Moskovitch set out to write her first book back in 2005, titled The Smart Divorce. Published in 2007 by Chicago Review Press and now in its third printing, the resource book is a Canadian best-seller. She went on to write a second book, The Smart Divorce Smart Guide, which was published in 2014.

Moskovitch researched and shared proven strategies and advice from 100 of North America's top divorce lawyers, financial advisers, counsellors, rabbis and other experts to help her readers navigate the system and manage the divorce process.

Responding to the demand for "neutral" support, in 2005 she founded her company, The Smart Divorce. As a divorce coach, Moskovitch is providing informative resources, support coaching, and powerful educational tools to empower and free people during a difficult period in their life.

"Coaching is not legal representation. Coaching is to help you best advocate for yourself and your needs, and to navigate the family law system and process, including the emotional sides," said Moskovitch.

"A divorce coach can maintain peace between the individuals who are divorcing, fulfilling one of the highest ideals in Judaism, hava'at shalom bayn ish l'ishto, assisting and maintaining peace between husband and wife. This rabbinic reference is not just to harmony in the home during marriage, but to maintaining peace in a broader sense, even when the home itself is torn apart," explained Rabbi Yossi Sapirman of Toronto's Beth Torah Congregation.

Moskovitch's clients are often overwhelmed making decisions, while not fully understanding the process.

"I will do the investigative work for you. If you have a high-conflict case, then you want to understand about litigation and why you may or may not want to pursue going to court. Understanding where you are as a Jewish wife or husband, how observant you are or are not, so when you develop the parenting plan, you plan for that. What does mediation mean and what are some of the considerations? Custody and access evaluation is an invasive, difficult process to go through.

"I am guiding my clients through one of life's most difficult experiences and helping them heal through divorce in an holistic way to avoid the scars and pain that can emerge," she said.

Added Rabbi Sapirman: "In her role, Deborah can maintain the inherent tselem Elokim, the reflection of the image of God that humanity represents. This is another way of saying that all human beings contain goodness representative of our Creator, and divorce is a moment in which that representation of good is diminished, as there is never an entirely good rupture and breakup."

With the phenomenon of "grey divorce" on the rise, Moskovitch is seeing more clients in their 60s and 70s. "However for the most part my clients are 30-plus," she said.

Moskovitch works out of her midtown Toronto office and can offer divorce advice via Skype with clients throughout North America, Israel, and Europe.

Sensitive to the financial aspect of divorce, Moskovitch offers clients package options. Included is a Smart Divorce Tool Kit, which includes her two books and four CDs. ■

Chabad co-operated with ethics investigation, rabbi says

RON CSILLAG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The Chabad rabbi at the centre of a controversy in which a federal cabinet minister was found to have violated conflict of interest guidelines says Chabad co-operated "fully" with the investigation and that its name has emerged unsullied.

In a statement released to The CJN, Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn, director of public affairs for the Canadian Federation of Chabad Lubavitch, said that his organization was "aware" that federal Ethics Commissioner Mary Dawson was investigating a $1-million grant to Chabad Lubavitch of Markham to make it accessible for the disabled, "although we were unaware of the specific nature of these allegations," adding, "we co-operated fully with this investigation."

Dawson's 46-page report, released March 10, found that the actions of Public Works Minister Diane Finley were "improper" and breached the Conflict of Interest Act because she awarded federal money to an infrastructure project backed by Rabbi Mendelsohn, who has close ties to prominent Conservative politicians, including Baird, in whose Ottawa riding the rabbi lives, and the prime minister.

The proposal was submitted by Rabbi Mendelsohn on behalf of the Canadian Federation of Chabad Lubavitch. At the time of the awarding of the grant in 2011, Finley was minister of human resources and social development, which is responsible for administering funding for accessibility projects.

The investigation was launched in 2012 amid media reports that Finley had overruled her own departmental bureaucrats and awarded the funding anyway.

Diane Finley

> I did not find any evidence that Rabbi Mendelsohn was a significant contributor of financial or human resources to the Conservative Party of Canada's election campaign in March and April 2011.

Even though there was "no suggestion" that Finley or any of her relatives or friends had a private interest in the decision to fund the Chabad centre, and no evidence that Finley and Rabbi Mendelsohn are friends or had ever met, Dawson found "that the Markham proposal clearly received preferential treatment." She found that Baird had "close ties" to the rabbi, and that Baird "made representations to Ms. Finley in support of the Markham proposal."

The Dawson report noted that Rabbi Mendelsohn "is well known on Parliament Hill," that he took part in Harper's trip to Israel last year, and that he "has developed relationships with certain ministers, ministerial staff and staff in the Prime Minister's Office whom he contacts frequently when he is seeking assistance or is planning an event."

After submitting his proposals, the rabbi "began contacting the staff of several ministers asking about the status of the proposals and seeking support for them." After contacting Baird's office in March 2011, an employee responded, "The minister got your package and was happy to mention his views on Chabad-Lubavitch to Minister Finley," according to Dawson's findings.

No one Dawson interviewed "was aware of whether the Chabad Lubavitch community provides significant financial support to the Conservative Party of Canada, but most surmised that it did not," her report noted.

"I did not find any evidence that Rabbi Mendelsohn was a significant contributor of financial or human resources to the Conservative Party of Canada's election campaign in March and April 2011."

Dawson's report "makes clear that neither I, nor anyone associated with Chabad-Lubavitch, conducted themselves in anything but a proper manner, both legally and ethically," Rabbi Mendelsohn said in the statement.

"We congratulate the ethics commissioner for having conducted such a thorough inquiry, and we thank her and her office for ensuring that the good name of one of Canada's premier faith-based community service networks remains intact."

Reached in Ottawa last week, Rabbi Mendelsohn refused to elaborate on his statement or answer questions.

His statement noted that Chabad "is a non-partisan network of Jewish community organizations serving the needs of people from a wide variety of religious, ethnic and social backgrounds. In that capacity, we liaise with elected representatives of all political stripes, and with all levels of government, irrespective of what political party is in power at any time."

In the House of Commons last week, Harper defended Finley, saying he believed she had "acted in good faith and she certainly had no personal interest whatsoever in the decision" to award the funding.

Chabad Lubavitch of Markham was ultimately awarded $1,044,000 to make the facility fully accessible to people with disabilities. But most of that money was later withdrawn because, according to Dawson, Chabad was unable to secure the necessary building permits and "there were significant increases in costs to deal with building deficiencies."

By that point, about $50,000 of the money had been spent, while the rest was returned to the program.

The CJN's calls to Chabad Lubavitch of Markham were not returned by The CJN's deadline. ■

Judge made assault seem like 'bar fight,' advocate says

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

The Calgary Jewish Federation is disappointed with the tone the court took at the sentencing of three pro-Palestinian protesters who pleaded guilty to assault after a Calgary demonstration turned violent last summer.

The statement of facts agreed on by both the Crown and prosecution seemed to treat the assault as a "bar fight," said Jeffrey Smith, chairman of the community relations committee of the Calgary Jewish Federation.

"This is not a bar fight. This was an assault on a peaceful group. It was almost an attack on Canadian values of freedom of expression and freedom of association."

Aziz Mohammed Madi, Arlsan Khan and Kamaal Maxamud Jaamac all pleaded guilty to one charge of assault each last week in court.

They were placed on probation for a year and fined between $300 and $500. The three men were also ordered to write letters of apology and to write essays on the Charter rights to freedom of expression and association.

A young offender who was also involved in the attack was sentenced in January to probation and community service.

The charges stem from a rally for Gaza held July 18 outside Calgary City Hall during the Israeli incursion into Gaza.

About a dozen pro-Israel supporters were at the rally, which attracted hundreds of pro-Palestinian supporters.

The agreed statement of facts described the incident "as a minor assault during a time of heated tensions between two groups," Smith said.

"The implication is that the counter-demonstrators provoked it somehow. The pro-Gaza demonstrators came across the street and just attacked and assaulted three of the individuals physically. There's no justification for that, and it's almost justified [by the statement]."

Judy Shapiro, associate executive director of the Calgary Jewish Federation, who was an observer at the July 18 rally, told The CJN last summer that a group of pro-Palestinian protesters "crossed over from the demonstration to the other side of the street and literally swarmed them. They surrounded them. They were up against a building, so there was nowhere to go and they were beaten up."

One person suffered a concussion and others were punched in the face and stomach.

The Calgary Jewish Federation filed a victim impact statement with the court, but it was not admitted, because the court held that an organization could not file this type of evidence.

The three men were young and first offenders, Judge Marlene Graham acknowledged, the Calgary Sun reported. Still, she said, "it's aggravating that you would engage in physical altercations that would undermine our Charter values."

Smith said the judge's order that the men write about human rights "obliquely" recognized the larger issues in the case.

The Calgary Jewish Federation had no formal comment on the severity of the sentences, Smith said.

"I did not think there would be serious sentences," he added. "I did think there should be a recognition of the underlying political nature of the attack." ■

The McGill University undergraduates' association defeated a motion that urged the university to divest from companies "profiting from the illegal occupation of Palestinian territories" by a vote of 276 to 212, with nine abstentions.

The secret ballot was held at the winter semester General Assembly of the Students' Society of McGill University (SSMU) on March 15. The motion was put forward by the student club Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR).

The motion was vigorously opposed by another club, Israel on Campus at McGill, which launched a social media campaign called "SSMU for All Students" on Facebook and #EnoughisEnough on Twitter to mobilize students of all backgrounds to vote against the motion.

This was the second anti-Israel motion SPHR has introduced this academic year. At the fall general assembly in October, a motion to "stand in solidarity with the people of the occupied Palestinian territories" and condemning Israel's "siege" of Gaze and "illegal" settlement expansion was shelved after a 402-337 vote.

The latest SPHR motion was harsher in the view of Israel of Campus, demanding that McGill's endowment cease investing in such major international corporations as Volvo, Re/Max and Oshkosh because of their alleged complicity in the violation of Palestinians' human rights due to their business activities in the territories.

It called for SSMU, with more than 30,000 students, to join with SPHR in pressing the university administration on this issue and to "educate" the McGill community on Israel's alleged violation of international law.

The motion was at the top of the agenda of the assembly and voting took place after an airing of views by both sides on the issue.

Supporter Zara Habib said, "This motion is not contesting Israel's right to exist. It is pointing out several actions of corporations. Why would anyone be against that?"

Another student countered that denying these international corporations' right to operate in the territories would hurt Palestinians more than Israel's economy.

Opponents earlier argued that the motion took a "unilateral stance on the divisive Israeli-Palestinian conflict" and would enable SPHR to "monopolize" the issue on campus and spread its message via the SSMU's network. "By promoting one narrative over another, the passage of this motion would necessarily delegitimize all other voices on Jordan Devon with Aliza Saskin, co-chair of Israel on Campus, at an information fair for McGill student clubs last fall.

McGill's campus... Students [would be] paying for this group to exercise sole control of the flow of information to students."

The undergraduates' decision was applauded by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and the pro-Israel group StandWithUs Canada.

"The McGill students have once again made their position clear," said CIJA Quebec executive member Rabbi Reuben Poupko. "They will not permit a polarizing and obsessive campaign designed to ostracize a group of students to have a place on campus. Inherent in the BDS [boycott, divestment and sanctions] movement is the bizarre idea that in the complex dispute between Israel and the Palestinians, one side is to blame for the failure of the peace process."

StandWithUs Canada director Meryle Kates said: "We congratulate all of the student leaders who stood up to fight against this divisive anti-peace, anti-justice motion," which she also termed racist.

"McGill's BDS campaign attempted yet again to single out one country, one people, and demonstrated clearly that their goals are racist because they target only one country in the world for condemnation."

The no campaign received broad-based support, including from both the federal Liberal party and its Quebec youth wing.

Federal leader Justin Trudeau tweeted "The BDS movement, like Israeli Apartheid Week, has no place on Canadian campuses. As a McGill alum, I'm disappointed [the motion was introduced]."

The motion came just before the annual Israeli Apartheid Week, spearheaded by SPHR, began at McGill and other universities.

The no side was also endorsed by Côte St Luc Mayor Anthony Housefather, who is the Liberal candidate in Mount Royal; Hampstead Mayor William Steinberg; the Armenian Students' Association; and the McGill Tribune. A number of non-Jewish students also signed an op-ed article that appeared in the Montreal Gazette on March 12 opposing the BDS campaign at McGill. ■

JGH head to helm regional health centre

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jewish General Hospital (JGH) executive director Dr. Lawrence Rosenberg has been appointed president-director general of one of the new regional entities that will administer public health and social services institutions on the Island of Montreal.

As of April 1, Rosenberg will head the Centre integré universitaire de santé et de services sociaux (CIUSSS) du Centre-Ouest-de-l'Ile de Montréal. It was created by Bill 10, the major health system restructuring passed by the National Assembly last month.

This CIUSSS will run most institutions affiliated with the Jewish community: the JGH, the Donald Berman Maimonides Geriatric Centre, Mount Sinai Hospital, Jewish Eldercare Centre and Miriam Home and Services, as well as the Constance-Lethbridge Rehabilitation Centre, Cavendish Health and Social Services Centre, and the de la Montagne Health and Social Services Centre, all in the city's west end.

Rosenberg became JGH executive director in November 2013, after serving for six years as chief of surgical services.

"This is an awesome responsibility, but there is much to do. There are people in need and problems to be solved," Rosenberg said. "I look forward to moving ahead with a broadly representative management team to take advantage of the numerous opportunities to improve access, to enhance quality and to establish a true continuum of care for patients served by the CIUSSS du Centre-Ouest," one of five on the island.

While many in the Jewish community were apprehensive about Bill 10 when it was introduced by Health Minister Gaétan Barrette in September, fearing that it would jeopardize the cultural character and community control of the six institutions founded by the Jewish community, Rosenberg expressed openness from the start.

He said at the time the JGH welcomed the opportunity to partner with other institutions in the area, believing it would improve the management of health care delivery. Today, Rosenberg says the reorganization is necessary to ensure access to services and "continuity of care."

"This will be a priority, and our team will see to it that this is achieved hand-in-hand with proper management," he said. "The network must also be able to count on competent health-care personnel who are ready and willing to actively contribute to change. In order for the transformation of the network to proceed properly, the involvement of those who work in the system is crucial."

Under the new legislation, which comes into effect April 1, most institutions in the province will lose their individual boards, which have been replaced by 33 CISSS or CIUSSS. A sixth institution with historic ties to the Jewish community, the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital, will be grouped with the CISSS de Laval.

"Throughout his career, Dr. Rosenberg has demonstrated a unique ability to combine extensive surgical expertise with an in-depth understanding of health care systems and management," JGH board president Allen Rubin said.

Rosenberg is credited with improving operational efficiency at the JGH under a program called Transformational Change that he introduced in 2011. In addition to his medical degree from McGill University and specialization in organ transplants, he earned a master's of engineering from the University of Waterloo, concentrating on knowledge management and innovation.

Rosenberg's time as JGH executive director has seen controversy. The province's anti-corruption unit investigated alleged irregularities in the awarding of contracts in the construction of the JGH's Pavilion K, the hospital wrestled with a $16-million deficit that led the government to assign a special monitor to oversee its elimination, and it has faced criticism for redirecting cancer patients from outside its territory to care closer to where they live, something the JGH said it was forced to do because its funding doesn't match the number of would-be patients

Dr. Lawrence Rosenberg

A kippah-wearing observant Jew, Rosenberg said the JGH would never abide by the previous Parti Québécois government's proposed charter of secular values, which he called "patently discriminatory."

Last year, he came out against the Liberal government's Bill 52 on end-of-life care, which will soon be implemented. He said the JGH would "explore all possibilities to opt out" of the law, which allows doctors to give a lethal injection to consenting adult patients with incurable conditions. ■

How can we ensure the future of Jewish education?

Supplementary schools can attract unaffiliated families

Seymour Epstein

One of the things I learned early in my career was to not compare day schools to supplementary settings. It is obvious that a holistic Jewish school environment which offers at least 12 hours of Jewish studies instruction per week provides a fuller Jewish curriculum than two to four complementary hours outside of the regular school day. One must approach supplementary schooling as a separate and unique educational instrument in itself.

My main reason for supporting the growth and enhancement of such schools is their potential to reach and attract families that are presently marginal to the Jewish life of the community. As synagogue members opt for day schools, and as synagogue-based supplementary schools falter and eventually close down, there is a need for alternatives that appeal to the unaffiliated and those who identify as non-religious. If a given community has only one-third of its children in day schools, the supplementary option should be available in a variety of "flavours" for the other two-thirds.

Many informed Jewish leaders have emerged from supplementary settings. A combination of a successful supplementary education, involvement in a youth group, and attendance at a Jewish-content summer camp can produce very committed Jewish identification.

But what is a successful supplementary setting in the 21st century?

It's not your grandmother's school, that's for sure!

The first change that must take place is to sever the experience from the bar and bat mitzvah, that North American ritual celebration that has done the most harm to Jewish literacy. In order to achieve its goal of an informed, identifying, and autonomous Jewish adult, all supplementary education (formal and informal) should be a continuum from early childhood to senior life. Any Jew who thinks that an emerging Jewish adult should go through life with a sophisticated and advanced general knowledge but only an elementary school level of Jewish literature, values, and history is dooming our people to abysmal ignorance. It's like walking down the street with one foot upon the sidewalk and the other in the gutter.

Another important element is the potential to mix formal instruction with different forms of Jewish life. We didn't really need John Dewey or Maria Montessori to teach us that the best instruction is life-connected – it's an essential part of our tradition. Our sages saw learning (Talmud Torah) as a mitzvah in itself, underscoring the point that learning and life are one.

In supplementary settings the terms formal and informal are interchangeable. Supplementary staff must be both morim and madrichim, teachers and guides/coaches. The potential for creativity in the formal-informal mix is overwhelming.

Another change that is needed is a re-think of the place of Hebrew. Once it is clear that one cannot learn language fluency in a supplementary setting, a decision is required that gives a place to the modern miracle of Hebrew revival in Israel and also gives those families who desire it, the ability to read the prayer book in Hebrew.

The solution is Hebrew language culture. Quickly decode the mechanical reading of a strange alphabet using games, computers, or whatever works and proceed to teach key words, songs, expressions, slang, etc. that are values-connected to the ideology of any given school.

My last recommendation for enhancement is to take full advantage of the Internet, both at school with teacher guidance and at home as family learning exercises.

Every Jewish community has families that cannot afford day school education, along with families whose Jewish lifestyle is less committed to intensive Jewish study. Supplementary schools are not an alternative to day schools; they are a complement to them in a community that values diverse forms of Jewish life. If we expand the variety of settings to attract peripheral families and creatively improve the quality of learning, supplementary schools can enhance both identity and literacy. ■

Seymour Epstein, is a teacher at York University and was the director of Toronto's Board of Jewish Education at UJA Federation.

Despite the high cost, day schools are worth fighting for

Lorraine Sandler

I was not born in a time when day schools as we know them existed. My Jewish learning was delivered by a kindly, well-meaning European melamed. What I learned was rudimentary, and what I didn't learn was monumental. My Jewish education was supplemented in my home and from Habonim, the Zionist Youth Movement. How I wish I had the opportunity of attending day school. Three hours a week – even three hours a few times per week – does not give one the kind of Jewish literacy I have so craved in my adult life.

When I advocate for day schools, I advocate for rich, sustained, meaningful Jewish education, which is the birthright of every single child born into the Jewish world. It is indeed the fundamental duty of Jewish parents to provide for the Jewish learning of their children. Some of us, while well meaning, do not have the requisite skills, but the responsibility is still ours.

The Jewish day school is an extraordinary environment to develop and enhance the Jewish learning of our children. The day school experience builds community spirit and belonging. Students make lasting Jewish relationships, even ones that result in Jewish marriages. A five-day-a-week school program allows for reinforcement, repetition and constant practice. This is the way children learn best.

While primary day school education is the foundation on which to build Jewish literacy skills, it is the high school experience that begins to cement that education and to embroider it with the depth and nuances of truly educated learning. One would not stop teaching a student math and English in Grade 8. Why then would one stop the teaching of Jewish material in Grade 8?

High school is where the knowledge and understanding from our teachings emerge – for understanding tolerance and respect, for a deep attachment to the Jewish people, for the emergence of leadership skills that will ultimately carry into one's life, for relationship building and the understanding of inter-dating, for one's relationship to the world and everything that is required of one to relate to it and all the peoples who inhabit it.

It is recognized that day school students become the leaders in the Jewish community. They have a sense of social responsibility to ensure Jewish continuity and the maintaining of rich Jewish life. The fact that these community activists are Jewishly literate ensures that our institutions and values are governed with respect, dignity, insight and a deep awareness for the needs of the vulnerable.

I make the case for day schools passionately. Notwithstanding the cost of a day school education, which the Jewish world must grapple with, I beg the question: "Why would parents not want their children to be competent and comfortable Jews?" The concept of facilitating Jewish ignorance in our children is very hard to stomach.

Numerous Jewish children attend private schools. Clearly cost is not the issue, since the cost of those schools is often greater than Jewish day schools. While parents might feel there are other incentives, I would challenge their motives. We need those children in our system. Our day schools must be as inviting. We cannot afford to lose one single child.

I do not for a moment negate the pressure under which parents are put, when having to make financial decisions of such proportions. It is frightening, and being middle class is punishing when it comes to having to make the choice to walk away from day school education. We need a groundswell of parents to fight for this right and to be vocal in large numbers and we need benefactors to understand that they have the future of Jewish literacy and belonging in their hands. This is a cause worth fighting for. ■

Gaza Strip reconstruction has barely begun after summer war

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

Eight months after the fighting between Israel and the Islamist Hamas movement in the Gaza Strip ended, reconstruction of the tens of thousands of homes destroyed or damaged in the densely populated Strip has barely begun. The international community has failed to pay its pledges to rebuild Gaza, Israel is dragging its feet on allowing cement into Gaza, and Egypt has kept the Rafah crossing closed most of the time, making it difficult for Palestinians to leave Gaza.

"The real reconstruction of Gaza hasn't begun yet," Adnan Abu Hasna, spokesman for the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) told the Media Line. "The whole process is very slow and needs to be accelerated."

In October, the international community pledged over $5 billion (US) for reconstruction, but Abu Hasna says only $175 million has arrived.

Outgoing UN representative to the Middle East Robert Serry proposed a three to five year truce between Israel and Hamas to enable the reconstruction of Gaza.

"The rehabilitation of Gaza will take years and for that we need time and a commitment from all concerned parties for a long-term reconstruction hudna (truce) to which all Palestinian factions should be committed," Serry said. Serry, who is finishing seven years in his job, raised the proposal with Hamas officials recently. Some press reports said Hamas was interested in the proposal, but a Hamas spokesman rejected it.

UNRWA deals only with those Palestinians classified as refugees, meaning just over one million of the 1.8 million who live in Gaza. Abu Hasna said that during the heavy Israeli air bombardment last summer during the fighting 96,000 homes belonging to refugees were damaged or destroyed, along with 30,000 homes belonging to non-refugees.

He said the UN has paid for minor repairs and rent subsidies for many of these families, but 10,000 refugees are still living in UN schools in Gaza. Many have found shelter with relatives, leading to overcrowded conditions, and thousands of other families are living in their ruined homes. In January, during heavy storms in Israel, the Palestinian health services said two infants and a man died due to the cold.

"Babies should not be dying of exposure," Sari Bashi, the co-founder of Gisha, an Israeli human rights group that investigates freedom of movement said. "Israel should allow more construction materials into Gaza."

That is another issue facing Palestinians in Gaza. According to Gisha, Israel has allowed fewer than 300,000 tons of cement and other materials into Gaza since the fighting ended, compared to the five million tons needed. Israeli officials say these materials are "dual-use" meaning that Hamas could use them to rebuild underground tunnels leading into Israel that Israel destroyed during the fighting. Gisha rejects that argument.

"These materials are available in Gaza on the black market or from recycled rubble or from Hamas stockpiles," Bashi said. "Militants who want to fortify tunnels can access cement but families who want to rebuild their homes cannot."

Bashi said the slow pace of reconstruction is strengthening the black market. If it would take 80 sacks of cement to rebuild a damaged house, and a Palestinian family is given only 30 sacks, they will not start the job, and instead will sell the 30 sacks on the black market.

Unemployment is officially 40 per cent in Gaza but the actual figure is higher as there are tens of thousands of civil servants from the Fatah party who have not worked since Hamas took power in 2007. The situation in Gaza is exacerbated by Egypt's insistence on keeping the Rafah border closed most of the time. Israel does not allow Palestinians from Gaza to enter without a permit.

The mood in Gaza is bleak, says Abu Hasna, as Palestinians wait and hope the Strip will be rebuilt.

"People are frustrated, disappointed and angry in Gaza," he said. "There is a feeling of no tomorrow." ■

Israel eases entry criteria for West Bank Palestinians

ELHANAN MILLER
JERUSALEM

Palestinian men over 55 and women over 50 will no longer need a permit to enter Israel from the West Bank, the IDF has declared. Previously, since October, men up to the age of 60 required a permit to enter Israel.

Yoav Mordechai, the co-ordinator of government activities in the territories, announced a series of Israeli measures intended to ease the lives of Palestinians both in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Starting last Sunday, Palestinian labourers can apply to enter Israel as long as they are married and over the age of 22. Previously, only married labourers over the age of 24 and with children were given entry permits by Israel.

Since October, the IDF has been easing measures in the West Bank in an attempt to improve the quality of life for Palestinians. At the time, men over 60 were allowed into Israel without a permit.

The new measures in the West Bank complemented Israel's easing of the blockade imposed on the Gaza Strip eight years ago, as agricultural produce from Gaza was allowed to enter Israel last week for the first time since Hamas' violent takeover in June 2007. The impetus for the move, Israel explained, was the shmittah year, during which Jewish agriculture is traditionally restricted.

According to Israeli watchdog Gisha, which deals with freedom of movement in Gaza, Israel and the West Bank accounted for 85 per cent of Gaza's export market prior to 2007. In November 2014, Israel allowed agricultural produce as well as fish and seafood from Gaza to be marketed in the West Bank.

"Gisha welcomes these steps to allow access to the Israeli market for Gaza farmers," the organization wrote in a press statement, "but cautions that much more needs to be done to ensure the real recovery of Gaza's economy, which remains a shared goal for all residents of the region." ■

Eva and Batya, or why Israelis deserve a bakery break

Sagi Melamed

There's something special about walking into a high-quality bakery – the aroma of baking, the stacks of breads and pastries. But more than that is the special energy of the customers. The look in their eyes as they lick their lips. The anticipation that thrills their senses. The challenge of choosing just the right delicacy from an array that delights the senses. The conscience wrestles with desires.

A nuclear Iran. Elections 2015. Senior police officers under investigation for sexual harassment. Sky-high housing prices. Trouble on our northern border. Increasing Jew-hatred around the world. So many vexations try the souls of the Israeli population. So Israelis are certainly entitled to visit a good bakery once in a while, to pamper themselves with tastes and smells.

Such were my thoughts as I entered the Eva and Batya bakery on Moshav Tzippori, which neighbours Hoshaya.

Full disclosure: I have a particular weakness for bakeries. In 1990, I fulfilled my childhood dream when I worked as a baker in the Harvest Bakery in New Haven, Conn. There's something primordial and creative about baking – mixing flour, yeast, water, salt, sugar and other ingredients, hand-kneading them and creating fragrant hot bread. When I travel, I find myself sniffing out special bakeries. I remember Paris more for its patisseries than its museums.

Betsy and I first visited this special little bakery one Friday morning about two years ago, a few days after hearing rumours of its opening. Behind the counter stood a young woman, Ma'ayan, who told me her childhood dream had been to be a cake and bread baker. After her army service, she started studying towards an academic degree, but she quickly decided that dreams should be fulfilled and switched to learning the art of patisserie.

Ma'ayan named her bakery after her two grandmothers. In the Israeli melting pot tradition, she combined Grandma Batya's fragrances of the Kurdish kitchen with Grandma Eva's refined European touch to create a unique style, tasty and aromatic, and based on locally grown products.

> Bakeries played a unique role in the development of the Zionist enterprise in the Land of Israel

Two years on, Eva and Batya employs seven women, two of them with special needs. The bakery on the moshav and the store in Ramat Yishai are small and intimate, but the shelves are laden with unique breads made of rye, organic spelt, whole wheat, beets and more. The little refrigerated section is full of homemade cakes: pear, strawberry, cheese, chocolate and poppy seed. On the counter is an eye-catching array of pastries, rolls, homemade granola and fancy cookies.

A Chinese proverb suggests that someone with only two coins should buy two things: bread, to live; and a flower, to have something to live for. Bread from Eva and Batya satisfies both requirements.

Starting a new business in Israel is not easy. It takes vision, determination, hard work, location, good products, and more. Ma'ayan's success in achieving her childhood dream and establishing a successful business in the Lower Galilee is, therefore, encouraging.

Bakeries played a unique role in the development of the Zionist enterprise in the Land of Israel. The annals of kibbutzim are replete with stories of hard-working kibbutzniks rising at dawn to a slice of bread hot from the oven, spread with oil and salt. This fresh-baked bread represented a little pampering for the country's founders and builders.

Like bakeries, Israel has come a long way since then, for good and for ill. But one thing remains the same: all Israelis are entitled, every so often, to go into a good bakery and pamper themselves a little. ■

Thousands rally in favour of right wing in Tel Aviv

JTA
TEL AVIV

Tens of thousands of right-wing Israelis at a Tel Aviv rally heard Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu vow not to withdraw from the West Bank.

The rally on Sunday in Rabin Square, two days before election day, came one week after a 40,000-person rally in the same location advocated the right wing's defeat. Much of the crowd on Sunday appeared to be religious Zionists.

Polls last week – the last ones before the balloting – showed Netanyahu's right-wing Likud Party trailing the centre-left Zionist Union.

Along with his vow on the West Bank, Netanyahu claimed that the Zionist Union's co-chairs, Isaac Herzog and Tzipi Livni, intended to cede eastern Jerusalem to Palestinian control.

He called for the crowd to increase right-wing turnout on election day to ensure that the right-wing parties stay in power. He also called on Moshe Kahlon, the former Likud minister who now heads the centre-right Kulanu party, to endorse him for prime minister.

Thousands gathered at a right-wing rally in Tel Aviv last Sunday. RONI SCHUTZER/ISRAEL SUN

"This effort revolves around one message: Anyone but Bibi," he said, referring to efforts to unseat him. "Ask yourselves, why are they doing this? Because they know that as long as I'm prime minister and Likud is in government, the nationalist camp is in government. And as long as the nationalist camp is in government, we won't divide Jerusalem, there won't be concessions, there won't be retreats."

Economy Minister Naftali Bennett, chairman of the religious Zionist Jewish Home party, also addressed the rally, singing the beginning of the song Jerusalem of Gold with the crowd. Eli Yishai, who heads the far-right Yachad party, spoke following Bennett. ■

Hyper Cacher market reopens, two men linked to gunman charged

JTA
PARIS

The kosher supermarket on the edge of Paris that was the site of a bloody hostage situation in January reopened Sunday.

Hyper Cacher, which was badly damaged in the attack, has been renovated and restaffed.

On Jan. 9, two days after the shooting at Paris' Charlie Hebdo magazine that left 12 dead, Muslim terrorist Amedy Coulibaly killed four Jewish hostages at the Hyper Cacher market before being killed by police who stormed the building.

The market, located in the Port de Vincennes neighbourhood in eastern Paris, is part of the Hyper Cacher chain of kosher markets in France and Italy.

Meanwhile, two men have been charged for their links to the gunman who killed four Jewish hostages there.

The men, identified as Amar R. and Said M. by the Associated Press, were charged for participating in a terrorist group with intent to commit a crime.

Amar R. exchanged over 600 text messages with the Hyper Cacher gunman Coulibaly between September and January. He also met with Coulibaly on Jan. 5 and 6, just days before the Charlie Hebdo shooting on Jan. 7 and Coulibaly's killing of a French police officer on Jan. 8.

Said M.'s DNA was found on a stun gun Coulibaly had with him on Jan. 9 when he took hostages in the Hyper Cacher market and killed four before being killed by police officers in a raid.

The prosecutor said that Amar R. and Said M. contacted each other more than 1,200 times between February 2014 and January 2015 and met regularly. They also destroyed their phone microchips on Jan. 9, the day of the Hyper Cacher attack.

Two others who had been detained earlier this week in conjunction with the new suspects were released.

Coulibaly claimed allegiance to the Islamic State in a video that surfaced after his death. The Kouachi brothers, who carried out the Charlie Hebdo shootings, said that the attack was sponsored by Al-Qaeda's branch in Yemen.

Coulibaly's widow Hayat Boumeddiene left a few days before the attacks in France and is believed to be in Syria. ■

Animosity doomed 2013-14 peace talks, blistering critique reports

JTA
WASHINGTON

One reason Israeli-Palestinian peace talks failed last year is that the sides were so far apart in their fundamental visions of what two states would look like. Another reason is that the two sides could barely stand each other.

Those are two of the contentions contained in a blistering critique of the failed 2013-2014 peace talks published March 2 by Ilan Goldenberg, the former chief of staff for the U.S. negotiating team and now the director of the Middle East security program at the liberal think-tank Center for a New American Security.

The 22-page paper, the most public accounting to date of the failure of the Barack Obama administration's months-long effort to broker a peace agreement between Israelis and Palestinians, is unusual in focusing less on the policy differences between the sides and more on the profoundly dysfunctional culture of recrimination and distrust.

Of the nine lessons Goldenberg outlines from the talks, only two focus on policy. Goldenberg's chief takeaway has to do with the mood in the room.

"Twenty years of inconclusive talks have poisoned the environment in the negotiating room, creating an atmosphere equivalent to a nasty and prolonged divorce," Goldenberg writes.

The latest round of peace talks, launched in the summer of 2013 and slated to last nine months, was the Obama administration's second attempt to settle the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Secretary of State John Kerry engaged in intense shuttle diplomacy, meeting dozens of times with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in an attempt to cajole them into bringing decades of conflict to a peaceful resolution.

In April 2014, the talks collapsed. In their wake, Israel endured a bloody summer war in Gaza, deep wounds in its alliance with the United States and the further entrenchment of a sense of distrust that Goldenberg believes precludes a return to peace talks anytime soon. Netanyahu and Abbas simply distrust each other too profoundly to get to a deal, Goldenberg said.

"These guys can never do it together," Goldenberg told JTA in an interview. "That's for sure."

The nastiness was expressed in petty insults, brinksmanship and an apparent eagerness by both sides to drive the other side crazy, Goldenberg said.

"Like any divorce negotiation, the two parties know each other all too well," Goldenberg writes. "They know one another better than the mediators know either of them. Each tends to use that knowledge to 'press buttons' on the other side to provoke and annoy."

In the interview, Goldenberg said the Israelis treated every Palestinian offer like the opening gambit in a bazaar. The Palestinians would make what they considered generous offers, Goldenberg said, but the Israelis continually insisted on more.

"When you tell the Israelis the Palestinians are not moving, the Israelis say, 'Wait, they're in the souk,'" Goldenberg said, using the Arabic word for market. "But the Palestinians really don't negotiate that way."

For their part, the Palestinians would make outrageous assertions that caused Israel to retrench. In 2014, top Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat accused Israel of killing the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and of plotting to do the same to Abbas.

"He knew that was ridiculous, the Israelis knew that was ridiculous, but they get all frustrated and high and mighty in the response," Goldenberg said.

In the paper, Goldenberg outlines how atmosphere affected policy. On repeated occasions, one side put an offer on the table and the other side would counter-offer with something the other side found unacceptable, leading to the withdrawal of the initial offer.

> "Twenty years of inconclusive talks have poisoned the environment in the negotiating room, creating an atmosphere equivalent to a nasty and prolonged divorce

"It was a nightmare, trying to figure out what was on the table and what was not on the table," he said.

The mistrust meant that what should have been easy agreements turned into major obstacles. One example was Israel's insistence that any deal acknowledge Israel's status as a Jewish state. At the outset of the Oslo process, in 1993, the term was a given, and Arafat used it multiple times.

Israel began to insist on the phrase's inclusion during the previous round of talks, in 2007-2008, just as the international movement to delegitimize the Jewish state was gaining traction. The more the Israelis insisted, the warier the Palestinians became, fearful that the move was an attempt to delegitimize the Palestinian historical narrative. What was once a small matter joined borders, security, Jerusalem and refugees as one of the crucial issues in the talks.

Goldenberg, 37, who was born in Israel and speaks fluent Hebrew, learned Arabic during his years at the University of Pennsylvania. Even though his American-born parents returned the family to the United States when he was eight, he maintains some Israeli mannerisms, like holding his thumb to his index and middle fingers to emphasize a point.

As in many divorces, the mediator – in this case, the Americans – took some hits. Among the most painful was Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon's description of Kerry as "messianic" and his accusation that the secretary of state was hankering for a Nobel Prize. Those jibes led to further American missteps.

"One of the things we tried to do, and didn't succeed at, is not get pulled into it," Goldenberg said, citing the anonymous U.S. official who called Netanyahu "chickenshit" in October.

"We can't get pulled down into the muck of the politics," he said.

Through it all, the American Jewish community remained "highly supportive" of the effort, Goldenberg writes.

Laura Blumenfeld, a former senior policy adviser on the negotiating team whose job included strategic outreach to American Jewish groups, agreed, noting how the community overcame its internal rivalries to back the talks. She recalled a White House briefing in February 2014 that included not only young Jewish, Christian, Arab and Muslim leaders, but the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) and the liberal advocacy group J Street all sitting at the same table. But the relationship between the United States and Israel suffered during the negotiations.

"If there was a marriage on the rocks, it was the Israeli-American relationship," said Blumenfeld, now a scholar-in-residence at Georgetown University. "Some days, it seemed there was more bickering than brokering." ■

Kauai vacation: A quick tutorial before you go

LAUREN KRAMER

There were only a few small items in my grocery basket so when the cashier asked me for $100 I insisted on seeing the receipt. There it was, a single loaf of very ordinary brown bread – no seeds, nothing fancy – listed at $7.50. There had to be a mistake, I thought, walking the loaf to the returns department of a Kauai K-Mart. But no, I was told. That was the price. A loaf that would cost $1.99 anywhere else in the United States was $7.50 on the island of Kauai.

We'd come as a family to enjoy a week in the sunshine of the tropical island and learned quickly it would be anything but an inexpensive vacation. Our first shock was when we'd tried to book a furnished house or flat, thinking it would be a perfect way to avoid the cost of eating out every day. We checked the usual sites: vrbo.com (Vacation Rental By Owner) and airbnb.com, and the listings showed beautiful accommodations, close to the beach and within our budget.

So we booked flights and went back to the website to secure a place to stay. That's when we discovered that all those listings were controlled by agencies, and though they appeared "available" online, when you actually tried to book them, you discovered they weren't.

The "hard sell" began the moment I called the agencies. "There's nothing left on the island," the agents would say, by way of introduction. Then, after a moment's pause. "All I have left is this apartment at $350 per night." Pictures of said apartments showed rooms last updated in the 1970s, tiny places that looked entirely unappealing. We learned visitors to Kauai book their accommodation up to a year ahead, sometimes more. And they pay premium prices for their island sunshine.

After many hours scouring online we found accommodation at a modest three-star resort, where we crammed four people into a tiny room and filled the excuse-for-a-refrigerator with snacks, lunch and breakfast foods. Still, the mostly lousy dinners we were forced to eat out cost an arm and a leg and were memorable only for their pitiful quality.

Kauai Vacation Lesson 1: Book early, ensure you have a kitchen, then visit Costco in Lihue and stock up.

Price sticker-shock aside, we were quickly bowled over by Kauai's lush beauty. Drive around the island and there are exquisite beaches around every corner, the palm tree-lined stretches of sand you see in the brochures lapped by warm water that make swimming pure pleasure. We had brought boogie boards and snorkel gear, and spent our days exploring beaches on different parts of the island.

In Poipu, the island's busiest beach, we snorkeled over the shallow reefs, while in Port Allen we marveled at a massive monk seal, stretched in languid repose on the shore. In Wailua the kids surfed for hours, riding small, but strong, waves onto the beach before venturing back for more. And in Princeville we watched a massive turtle swim leisurely, oblivious to the swimmers and snorkelers nearby. With sunscreen and a picnic lunch in hand the hours spun by beneath the Hawaiian sun, a perfect tonic after the grey, cold winter back home.

Kauai Vacation Lesson 2: The beach is all you really need.

"You have to see Waimea Canyon," folks told us. We had good intentions of visiting the "grand canyon of Kauai" but when we started out and learned it would be close to two hours each way, four kids fighting in the backseat, the canyon felt a whole lot less appealing. Instead, we contented ourselves with a hike up Nounou Mountain, through a forest of Norfolk Pines with ringed trunks that felt straight out of a magical fairytale. The hike was exhilarating and muddy, taking us past locals' backyards where orange trees hung heavy with ripe fruit. Never has fruit theft felt more appealing – though we kept our hands to ourselves.

Later, at one of Kauai's farmers' markets, we had ample opportunity for tasters. We purchased $5 coconuts from one young man who wielded a machete and expertly sliced them so we could drink the sweet milk before devouring the soft interior. And we gratefully accepted samples of colourful rambutan, miniature apple-bananas, massive avocados and Kauai-made chocolate spreads, jams and honey.

There's a farmers' market somewhere on the island every day of the week and when you find one, it's a great opportunity to interact with locals and stock up on fresh local fruit and veggies. Just don't even think about bringing them home. Produce export is strictly monitored at the airport and we even witnessed the confiscation of a small container of peeled mango someone had tried to save for the flight.

The only time we opted for a group excursion with a local tourism vendor, we wished afterwards that we hadn't. The kayak tour mentioned a paddle upriver and snorkeling in a secluded cove. What it didn't mention was that the river was very unremarkable, and that we'd need to commute an hour each way to reach the excursion. The disappointing outing robbed us of a precious day on one of the island's better beaches and our dinner later that night, at a Hanalei restaurant, represented a new low in our island eating experience.

Kauai Vacation Lesson 3: Rent a car, buy a guide book and explore on your own. ■

Teen to play for Germany in European Maccabi Games

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Almost 70 years after his great-grandparents fled Nazi Germany, 14-year-old Montrealer Jacob Fraenkel will return to that country this summer to play soccer in the European Maccabi Games – for Germany.

Canadian-born Fraenkel, who was selected last June by the Maccabi Munich team, has German citizenship through his father, Sharon Fraenkel, who was born in Israel to German parents. They returned to Germany – to Munich – when the elder Fraenkel was a child.

Sharon, who has lived in Montreal since 1997, retains his German nationality. His mother and younger brother still live in Munich.

"I'm tremendously proud, it's very hard to put it into words," said the father, who emphasized this was Jacob's choice. "It's like things have come full circle."

Jacob's grandparents are also ecstatic.

Jacob says being able to play for Germany in the Jewish games makes him proud, too. "That is who I am," he said. "That is my heritage." Besides, he points out, soccer in Germany is "light-years ahead of that in Canada."

The quadrennial regional Maccabi games, to be held in Berlin from July 27 to Aug. 5, are the first-ever on German soil. One of the venues is the Olympic Park, site of the controversial 1936 games. These games have additional significance because it is 70 years since the end of World War II, and the 50th year of diplomatic relations between Germany and Israel and the re-establishment of Maccabi Germany.

Jacob is the only dual citizen on the German U16 Maccabi soccer team and, to his knowledge, on any of the German teams.

"Half the players on his team are the sons of people I grew up with in Germany. We all belonged to the same Zionist youth organization and went to its camp," said Sharon.

Over 2,500 athletes, coaches and other officials are slated to attend from 30 countries. Because of the exceptional nature of these games, non-European countries were invited: Israel, the United States and Canada are among those sending athletes, although there is no Canadian soccer team.

Jacob, a Dollard des Ormeaux resident who attends John Rennie High School's Sports-études program, has been playing soccer since he was four. He was an outstanding goalkeeper for the Club de Soccer Mont-Royal-Outremont league last year. Currently between seasons, he is being courted by two teams in the Quebec premier league for his age group.

Jacob Fraenkel, 14, with father, Sharon, is the great-grandson of Jews who fled the Nazis.
JANICE ARNOLD PHOTO

His sights, however, are set on playing professionally in Europe, preferably Germany. He hopes scouts at the Maccabi Games notice him. He'll spend the summer in Germany to advance that dream. His idol is former German star goalie Oliver Kahn.

Last year, Fraenkel tried out with three professional Munich teams, including famed Bayern Munich. Europe drafts players as young as 16. Jacob turns 15 during the Maccabi games.

Sharon's mother, Ernestine, was born in a displaced persons camp in Vilshofen, Germany, in 1946, to Polish parents who survived a Siberian labour camp. The family remained in Germany, settling in Munich.

His father, Eli, who now lives in Mahone Bay, N.S., was born in 1944 in Israel, where his newly married parents fled in 1936. Sharon's father met his mother in Israel when she was on a visit. They married in 1968 and Sharon was born in 1970.

In 1974, the family moved to Germany. Sharon made aliyah in 1995. He visited Montreal soon after and met his wife-to-be, Jacob's mother, Moroccan-born Nicole Guigui, here, married and stayed.

Jacob admits his identity often baffles non-Jews his age. "If I say I'm Jewish and German they don't know how that can be because they think German automatically means Nazi or Jew-hater," he said.

He has taught himself German over the past year, with the help of his father and by correspondence with his grandmother, and is now close to fluent. ■

HUSBAND & WIFE TEAM REPRISE ROLES IN TAMING OF THE SHREW

Julia Nish-Lapidus, who with her husband James Wallis runs the theatre company Shakespeare BASH'd, plays Kate the Shrew to her husband's Petruchio in a raucous remounted production of The Taming of the Shrew, the earlier version of which was named Best of Fringe at the 2012 Toronto Fringe Theatre Festival.

When they first took on the roles for the Fringe, they were only engaged, not yet married. "On our first date, James joked that we should play these parts," Nish-Lapidus recalled. "Tackling them for the first time just months before our wedding was incredible, but I'm so excited to revisit this controversial relationship now that we've been married for almost three years. We've got a new perspective on the relationship and can't wait to share it with an audience."

Soon after graduating from theatre school, she received some of her early training at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, where her mother was then principal. Invited to create a Shakespeare festival at the school, Nish-Lapidus worked with the students on a production of A Midsummer Night's Dream, then Macbeth the following year.

The Taming of the Shrew, directed by Alex Johnson, runs April 9 through 12 at the Monarch Tavern, 12 Clinton St. just south of College. Tickets $18, available at www.shakespearebashd.com or at the venue before each performance. Check the website for showtimes.

Beth Sholom Ruach Singers help draw younger congregants

Aaron Jensen (left) does the musical arrangements for the Ruach Singers. J-M Erlendson (standing against the window) helped put the choir together and to his left, Beth Sholom's Cantor Eric Moses and Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich (far right, behind chair) give input.

For nearly a decade, Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich of Beth Sholom Synagogue has been aware that younger people aren't attending synagogue in the same numbers as what he called the "entrenched older cohort."

He's aware the issue isn't specific to Beth Sholom, but that it speaks to "a larger problem throughout North America."

After brainstorming with Beth Sholom's Cantor Eric Moses about ways to give the Shabbat morning service "a new sound," the two landed on a cappella as a possible solution.

In 2013, a Google search lead Rabbi Flanzraich to an article written in The CJN about J-M Erlendson, a member of Toronto pop/jazz a cappella singing group Countermeasure.

Inspired, Rabbi Flanzraich and Moses approached Erlendson and Aaron Jensen, Countermeasure's composer and arranger, and asked if they'd be interested in helping to develop a choir.

"It was a perfect fit," Erlendson said. "We worked with them to produce the Ruach Singers, which now has a home at Beth Sholom."

Comprising a core group of eight singers whom Jensen and Erlendson either know from Countermeasure or the local music community, the Ruach Singers have been incorporated by Rabbi Flanzraich into a special, monthly Shabbat morning service that he established last spring.

Dubbed "Shabbat Beth Sholom," the service's purpose is to help congregants of all ages and backgrounds better connect to prayer and to their faith.

It is, therefore, shorter, more condensed and, as Rabbi Flanzraich put it, "crisper" than a traditional Shabbat service.

Only two hours long – compared to the usual three and a quarter – and beginning at 9:45 a.m. instead of 8:45, the halfway point of the service is marked by the Ruach Singers entering the sanctuary and performing traditional Hebrew liturgical songs with a unique, contemporary twist.

Using their voices to create an instrumental sound, the Ruach Singers use melodies informed by contemporary music, as well as integrate samples from existing songs and cross genres, ranging from pop to beat box to folk.

Their repertoire includes part of the Kedushah set to the song One Day, by Jewish rapper Matisyahu, and a rendition of Adon Olam to the tune of When I'm Gone, from the movie Pitch Perfect.

"There's quite a range of artists that we draw inspiration from, and we've used samples from anyone from Mumford and Sons to Kelly Clarkson," Jensen said.

Though Jensen does the arrangements, the process is collaborative, with both Rabbi Flainzraich and Moses contributing their visions.

"They'll approach me and say, 'Can we treat this piece in this particular way?'" Jensen said. "Or they'll send me samples of songs that capture a certain spirit, and then I'll hole up at home, work on something and send it back to them."

He maintains that it's this partnership, as well as the Ruach Singers' innovative sound, which make the group one of a kind.

"Musically speaking, I'm not aware of any other ensemble that's taken such musical chances in terms of re-envisioning this body of songs," Jensen said.

Rabbi Flanzraich noted that liberal congregations in the United States are increasingly using musical groups, equipped with instruments, to draw young people to shul, but the Ruach Singers are special insofar as they simulate the sound of instruments with their voices.

"No one's doing anything like this," he said, "weaving an a cappella group's singing into the liturgy and tfillah itself. It's very unique and unprecedented."

The feedback, he added, has been extremely positive, and people in their 20s and 30s, both Beth Sholom congregants and guests who've heard about the service through word of mouth, are increasingly attending Shabbat Beth Sholom.

The turnout on these Shabbats has ranged from 250 to 700 people, he said, whereas the typical Shabbat service usually has anywhere from 150 to several hundred people.

"When the Ruach Singers are performing, there's a lot of swaying, clapping, smiling," he said. "There's a real engagement with it."

The Ruach Singers are in the process of recording an album that will feature Moses on some tracks.

"We're so excited to…take this revolution in Jewish music and make something we can show to people at other synagogues," said Erlendson, "to others interested in putting a twist [on traditional liturgy.]"

Rabbi Flanzraich stressed that this evolution in Jewish music reflects people's "urge to pray, access and worship God. That hasn't changed, it's how we do it that has, and will continue to change."

The next Shabbat Beth Sholom will take place April 18. ■

Mordecai Richler made an honorary citizen of Montreal

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

A saga that probably would have amused, rather than annoyed the creator of the likes of Solomon Gursky came to a satisfying conclusion on March 12 when the City of Montreal at last found a fitting way to immortalize one of its most illustrious sons.

Writer Mordecai Richler was posthumously declared an honorary citizen of Montreal – where he was born in 1931 and died in 2001 – by Mayor Denis Coderre, who called him "an outstanding cultural ambassador." It was also announced, as expected, that Bibliothèque du Mile End, the public library on Park Avenue, is being renamed Bibliothèque Mordecai-Richler.

Richler's widow Florence and sons Noah and Jacob, who in recent weeks have expressed frustration and disappointment with the city's foot-dragging, are happy with the choice.

"How proud Mordecai would have been," said the gracious Florence. "I'm so elated; it's so apt, isn't it?"

More apt, almost everyone agrees, than the renaming for Richler of the dilapidated gazebo in Jeanne Mance Park, on Mount Royal's eastern slope, which the previous Gérald Tremblay administration had proposed in 2011, the 10th anniversary of the author's death.

"We are profoundly grateful," said Jacob. "It [the library] is a far more elegant solution," adding that he is thankful this has happened in his 85-year-old mother's lifetime.

The gazebo project was to have been completed in 2012, but to this day no work has begun on the structure that dates back to 1928. Coderre said it will be renovated this summer, but without the Richler tag.

While paying homage to Richler, neither Coderre nor Luc Ferrandez, opposition leader at city hall and Plateau Mont-Royal borough mayor, ignored that fact that Richler remains a controversial, if not reviled, figure. Jacob observed that even some city councillors today are opposed to this tribute.

Nationalists, who perceived Richler as anti-Quebec, were fiercely opposed to any honour for him when the idea was championed by Coun. Marvin Rotrand in 2011. Plateau borough officials were also against naming anything for him at the time, even though Richler made his childhood neighbourhood world famous.

As Coderre said, Richler was uncompromising in speaking his mind, whether it was about francophone Quebecers or his own Jewish community. "He saw challenging the established order as part of his job as a writer."

In addition to his artistic merit, the citation of honorary citizenship speaks to Richler's prickly politics: "Criticism was a key element in the writing of this purposefully provocative polemicist, who never shied away from controversy."

No one, however, denies Richler's deep attachment to Montreal, which he returned to in the early 1970s after living in London for 20 years.

"Make no mistake," said Jacob, "my father loved this city, foibles and all, and perhaps because of its foibles…He was committed to getting Montreal exactly right, and that is why he came back to it."

His credo was that "painful truths" should be aired and not allowed to fester under the surface, Jacob said. Noah thinks if he were alive today his father would speak out against the prejudice directed at Muslims.

Ferrandez noted how characteristic it is of Montreal's sophistication that a predominantly French library in a former Anglican church be named for a Jewish writer, who grew up in the district.

Richler, he said, abhorred "small-mindedness and provincialism" and that is "why he took such shots, swinging in all directions, and almost always hitting the mark.

"No matter how complicated his relationship with Montreal and Quebec was, he was always of it."

Michael Levine, Richler's literary executor, said the writer disliked hypocrisy and xenophobia, and "always spoke truth to power."

However, Levine admitted their relationship began as an adversarial one.

Levine was the lawyer of a person who wanted to sue Richler for one of his works, but as soon as Levine met the defendant he was thoroughly charmed. "I became Sancho Panza to his Don Quixote.

"When he died, we faced a dilemma because this country has a tradition of burying its authors and forgetting them."

Montreal's homage is the beginning of a series of artistic projects and activities over the coming year to commemorate Richler, in which Levine has had a hand.

Among them are a reissue of French translations of five Richler novels by Edition du Boréale starting with Solomon Gursky (originally Solomon Gursky Was Here) this month; a new musical adaptation of The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, featuring a score by eight-time Oscar-winning composer Alan Menken, in June, and audiobooks of his novels recorded by leading Canadian actors like Colm Feore and Martha Henry. There'll even be a Mordecai Richler snooker tournament in Montreal later this year. ■

A soft-hearted novella of a bitter time

NORMAN RAVVIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When the Montreal writer A.M. Klein visited Israel in 1949 he was nonplussed by its nascent literary scene. The "poets of the settlement," he wrote, "were milder, kinder men," who wrote verse with "lyric sentiment" influenced by such 19th century models as Heinrich Heine and Alexander Pushkin.

Either Klein missed the major, young voice of Yizhar Smilansky, who wrote under the pen name S. Yizhar, or he decided that provocative work like Khirbet Khizeh was beyond his ken because it was offered in prose.

Yizhar is one of Israel's best-known prose writers, whose early work, including the newly reissued novella Khirbet Khizeh, provided a prominent literary mirror in which the state viewed itself.

As Klein traversed the country, developing a report he would take back to the Canadian Jewish Congress, and working on his own literary portrait of Israel, he must have encountered the provocative discussions raised by Yizhar's portrayal of the events of the country's War of Independence.

Khirbet Khizeh, along with Yizhar's other novels, played a central role in the development of modern Hebrew literature, but his work has only recently found its way to an English language audience. In 2008, the first full English translation of Khirbet Khizeh appeared from Jerusalem-based Ibis Editions, a non-profit, activist publisher dedicated to bringing out "Levant-related books of poetry and prose" in translations from Hebrew, Arabic, French and other languages of the region. A British edition of Khirbet Khizeh appeared in 2011. Farrar Straus and Giroux has recently reissued the English translation for a North American audience.

Reviews of Khirbet Khizeh inevitably recount its slender plot line, which focuses on a single day's activities undertaken by a company of young Israeli army men whose "operational orders" are to clear the last of an Arab village's population in order to level the area and prepare it for new Israeli settlement.

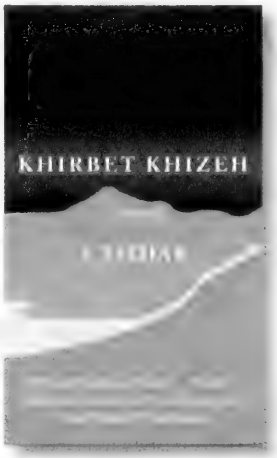
Yizhar's narrator is deeply divided over the orders he must follow, and he argues with his comrades, however fitfully, over the rightness of the plan to expel the remaining populace of Khirbet Khizeh.

His argument regarding why "it's not right" to do so is met with the challenge, "So what do you suggest?" The narrator's reply – "I just don't know" – is demolished by a cynical but practical-minded response: "If you don't know – then shut up."

This he more or less does, while offering the reader an aching and inward monologue considering the acts and likely fate of the new country he serves. "And so it happened," he tells us, "as we set out that clear splendid winter morning, cheerfully making our way, showered, well fed, and smartly turned out; and so, in the light breeze, we got out at a certain point close to a village that wasn't yet visible."

Yizhar was in his early 30s when Khirbet Khizeh appeared. Born in Rehovot, his family had arrived in Palestine from Kiev at the turn of the 20th century. His literary mentors were James Joyce, William Faulkner and Thomas Wolfe. But part of his uniqueness arose from the challenges associated with founding a modernist Hebrew voice among Israel's first generation of native Hebrew speakers.

(Klein found "new life" being given to the "antique speech" in the realm of business advertising; dry cleaning shops were called Kesheth, for the rainbow, a brand of Israeli sausage, Bashan, paid tribute to the land of a giant king in the Bible).



Khirbet Khizeh
S. Yizhar
Trans. N. de Lange and Y. Dweck
(Farrar Straus and Giroux / Ibis Editions)

Biblical imagery and allusions remain a key element in Yizhar's modern Hebrew voice, and translators have struggled to convey this straddling position between the ancient Jewish view of the land and its contemporary character. This paradoxical position informs Yizhar's narrator's sense of being not-at-home as events unfold.

As the platoon waits, upon a hilltop, to descend to the terraced lands of Khirbet Khizeh, our guide wishes he could leave what's about to be done to others: "If someone had to get filthy, let others soil their hands. I couldn't. Absolutely not."

> Khirbet Khizeh, along with Yizhar's other novels, played a central role in the development of modern Hebrew literature

Aspects of the book are prophetic. Yizhar conveys, with great emotional impact, an Arab boy being sent away from his home, and the narrator arrives at an awareness that "what was happening in the heart of the boy . . . could only become a viper inside of him." By way of the author's appreciation of exile, the narrator wishes he could discover an Arab "Jeremiah mourning and burning, forging a mouth of fury in his heart, crying out in stifled tones to the old God in Heaven, atop the trucks of exile."

Responses to the reissue of Yizhar's novella routinely read it as an expression of one side of the events that took place with the creation of the State of Israel. But Khirbet Khizeh strives to see the events leading up to and following 1948 from many sides – both Arab and Jewish. It's potential for education and the creation of dialogue is great. Whether its newfound readers will rise to the occasion is an open question. ■

A taste of Peru – something new for your Passover menu

NORENE GILLETZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Passover is the biggest Jewish holiday for entertaining, as families gather around the table for all or part of the eight days. Cookbook author Paula Shoyer offers up some deliciously different recipes for your Passover table in her latest best-selling cookbook, The New Passover Menu (Sterling, 160 pp). Shoyer combines the nostalgic pleasure of family favourites with contemporary creations. Her innovative recipes will provide a fresh approach to the upcoming Passover holiday.

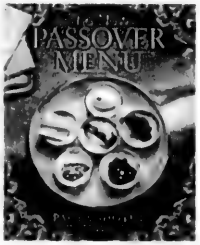
The New Passover Menu contains 65 recipes organized into eight different menus, featuring easy, beautiful, contemporary food and desserts. Shoyer suggests using the menus as they are, or you can mix-and-match them.

Paula shares some of the customs from their family's seders: "My husband, Andy, leads the seder surrounded by a pile of Haggadahs and commentaries and shares readings from them. A major part of our seder is the Exodus story told in the form of a play written by Andy. We incorporate both Andy's Romanian tunes and those from my childhood. Our children share insights they learned in school, and we talk about our own struggles and how we can overcome them as the Israelites did theirs."

Shoyer continues: "Our favourite tradition takes place during the song Chad Gadya. Everyone gets to be a character from the song and has to develop a sound to represent it. We go around the table and each person makes the sound on cue. We love to hear the grandfathers make sounds like a dog or goat, and somehow there's always someone who can create hilarious sounds for fire and water. Everyone at the table laughs and laughs."

The New Passover Menu contains fabulous menus for the seders and all week long, including nostalgic family favourites as well as Italian, French and barbecued dishes, along with some delectable dairy dishes. There are new, updated twists on traditional recipes, such as Banana Charoset, Fresh Salmon Gefilte Fish Loaf with Arugula, Avocado, and Mango Slaw, or Chicken Soup with Chicken Meatballs and Zucchini Spaghetti. Innovative salads include Seder Plate Salad and Kale Caesar Salad. You'll find international main dishes such as Peruvian Roast Chicken with Salsa Verde (below), and Moroccan Spiced Short Ribs.

The breakfast chapter includes Fruit and Nut Granola and versatile Gluten-Free Waffles or Pancakes. There are also some new fabulous desserts, which are Paula's specialty, many of them gluten-free: Pistachio and Strawberry Roll, Easy Fruit Cake, Opera Cake and Triple Chocolate Biscotti.



Shoyer says: "Armed with this book and the bonanza of Passover ingredients that are available today, you can enjoy delicious, elegant, and inspired holiday meals – and create new Passover food memories at the same time."

Here are two eye-catching, stellar recipes to include on your new Passover menu. Enjoy in good health!

Passover outside the box

RANDY FINGRUT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I have said it before and I will say it again: Passover does not have to taste like Passover. Think outside the box and use as many fresh ingredients as you can in your main courses, sides and desserts. Try to stay away from too many dry, packaged ingredients, like matzah and farfel. At any rate, you will be eating enough matzah with your meals. Instead, look to fresh fruits and vegetables, nuts, herbs and even jams to jazz up your Passover meals.

Roasted Beet Salad

A simple yet elegant start to your seder meal.

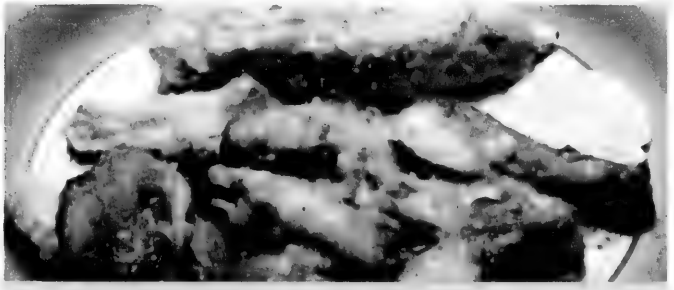
- ❑ 6 medium beets
- ❑ lettuce of your choice, washed and torn
- ❑ English cucumber, sliced
- ❑ grape tomatoes
- ❑ mini carrots
- ❑ whatever other salad vegetables you like, sliced

Dressing

- ❑ 2 tbsp. white vinegar
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 1 tsp. dried tarragon
- ❑ 1/4 cup olive oil

Preheat oven to 425. Wash beets well and wrap in tin foil. Bake for 45 minutes, remove them from the oven and let cool. Remove the tin foil, slide off the skins and cut away any remaining stems. Slice beets into julienne strips.

In a small bowl, mix the dressing ingredients, then plate the salads and drizzle with dressing.



Honey Clementine Chicken Breasts

Tender and juicy, Honey Clementine Chicken Breasts will be a deliciously different change to your Passover seder.

- ❑ 1 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 2 tbsp. grated clementine rind
- ❑ 1 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. pepper
- ❑ 6-8 chicken breasts, boneless and skinless
- ❑ 1/2 cup clementine juice
- ❑ 1/4 cup chicken stock
- ❑ 1/4 cup honey

Grease a 9x12-in. Pyrex baking dish with oil. Combine matzah meal, clementine rind, salt and pepper in a flat bowl. Place clementine juice in a second flat bowl. Wet a chicken breast in the juice and then place it into the crumbs, covering completely with crumbs. Place in the Pyrex dish and continue with the rest. Reserve the clementine juice and discard any remaining crumbs.

Combine 1/4 cup of clementine juice, chicken stock and honey. Pour mixture around the chicken. Bake in a 350-degree oven for 60 minutes or until chicken is cooked through. ■

Peruvian Roasted Chicken With Salsa Verde

Prep time: 10 minutes for chicken, 30 minutes for sauce
Cook time: 1 hour for chicken, 25 minutes for sauce
Advance prep: Chicken may be made 1 day in advance; sauce may be made 1 week in advance.

For many years, our family has been blessed with Betty Supo, a wonderful do-it-all nanny. Among her many talents, she is a terrific cook and has introduced our family to flavourful Peruvian dishes. Her best is Arroz con Pollo with Salsa Verde (chicken with rice and a luscious green chili sauce.) Here is the version that Betty and I cooked up so the world could enjoy a taste of Peru during Passover. If you like really spicy food, include the jalapeno pepper seeds in the frying pan along with the peppers.

For the roasted chicken:

- ❑ 1 large whole chicken, cut into 8 pieces
- ❑ 4 tsp. ground cumin
- ❑ 1 tbsp. paprika
- ❑ 2 tsp. garlic powder
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt, plus more as needed
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. black pepper, plus more as needed
- ❑ 3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1 head garlic, cloves separated, not peeled

For the salsa verde:

- ❑ 2 tbsp. vegetable oil
- ❑ 4 cloves garlic, cut in half
- ❑ 1 medium onion, cut in half and sliced
- ❑ 2 jalapeno peppers, halved (remove seeds for a milder flavour; keep seeds for more heat)
- ❑ leaves from 1 large or 2 small bunches of fresh cilantro
- ❑ 1/4 cup water
- ❑ 1/2 tsp. kosher salt

To make the chicken:
Preheat oven to 400. Place the chicken pieces in a large roasting pan. In a small bowl, combine the cumin, paprika, garlic powder, salt and black pepper. Drizzle 1 tbsp. of the oil over the chicken and rub to coat. Shake the spice mixture onto the chicken and rub all over.

Place the garlic cloves in a small bowl and add the remaining 2 tbsp. of oil. Season with salt and pepper; toss to coat. Scatter the garlic cloves and drizzle the oil over the chicken pieces. Bake, uncovered, for 50 minutes to 1 hour, or until well browned and the juices run clear.

To make the salsa verde:
Heat the oil in a medium frying pan over medium-high heat. Add the garlic and cook for 1 minute. Add the onion and cook for 3 to 5 minutes, or just until they soften. Add the jalapeno halves, open side down, and cook for 1 minute. Turn them over and cook for another 4 minutes over medium-low heat, stirring occasionally, until the jalapenos are fork-tender.

Let cool for 20 minutes. Place the jalapeno mixture in a food processor, add the cilantro leaves, water and salt, and process until pureed and smooth. Cover and store in the fridge for up to 1 week.

Serve the chicken on a platter and the salsa verde in a bowl alongside. Serves 4-6. ■

Midweek Passover meals with a Sephardi flavour

SYBIL KAPLAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

After the seders, by midweek, you may be looking for some interesting, creative ideas for Passover dinners.

Here are some ideas I frequently use.

A mina is a traditional Sephardi savoury, layered pie that's great for leftover chicken. In Spain and Turkey, it's called mina; in Egypt, it's called maiena or mayena; in Algeria, it's meguena; in Italy, it's scacchi. The pie is also popular among Jews from the Island of Rhodes and Yugoslavia.

Chicken Mina

- ❑ 2 cups cooked, shredded chicken
- ❑ 1/2 cup chopped scallions
- ❑ 1/2 cup chopped Italian parsley
- ❑ 1/4 cup chopped mint
- ❑ 1/4 cup chopped dill
- ❑ 2 eggs
- ❑ 6 matzahs
- ❑ chicken soup
- ❑ olive oil
- ❑ 3 eggs
- ❑ 1/2 cup tomato sauce
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. nutmeg

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a rectangular or oval baking dish. In a bowl, combine chicken, scallions, parsley, mint and dill. Add 2 eggs and blend.

In another bowl, combine 3 eggs, tomato sauce and nutmeg.

Place matzahs in bottom of a deep dish. Pour in enough chicken soup to soften, about 3 minutes.

Place 2 matzahs in greased baking dish. Brush with olive oil. Spread half the chicken filling on top. Add 2 more matzahs, brush with oil and spread rest of chicken filling on top. Top with remaining 2 matzahs.

Pour tomato sauce on top. Bake in preheated oven 45 minutes. Cut into squares to serve. Makes 6-8 servings.

Chicken Tagine

A tagine is a North African, slow cooked savoury stew, named after the earthenware clay cooking pot it's traditionally prepared in. The base is flat and circular with low sides. The cover is cone or dome shaped, which traps the steam and returns the condensed liquid to the pot, thus requiring very little liquid when cooking. In a chicken tagine, vegetables or dried fruit, nuts and spices are added.

- ❑ 1 cup matzah meal
- ❑ 8 pieces of chicken
- ❑ oil
- ❑ 4 cups chopped onions
- ❑ 2 cups chicken soup
- ❑ 1 1/2-3 cups prunes, apricots or other dried fruit
- ❑ 2 tsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1 tsp. ginger
- ❑ 1/4 cup lemon juice
- ❑ 2 tsp. lemon peel
- ❑ 1 cup slivered almonds

Place matzah meal in a shallow dish. Dip chicken pieces in the meal.

Heat oil in a soup pot. Add chicken and brown. Add onions, chicken soup and dried fruit and simmer until chicken is cooked. Add cinnamon, ginger, lemon juice, lemon peel and almonds. Simmer another 20 minutes. Makes 8 servings. ■

Cookbook created with heart

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Flo's Kitchen, a collection of recipes assembled over some 40 years, was launched in early February by author Shari Naimer.

The endeavour began as a mother/daughter project compiling all of the late Florence (Flo) Naimer's too-many-to-count recipes collected from books and age-old binders filled with magazine and newspaper clippings.

The initial concept emerged from Flo's granddaughter Erin, now 22 years old. Several years ago, Erin's upcoming bat mitzvah inspired her mother, Shari, with a desire to give her daughter and their guests the gift of a treasured cookbook.

"I asked Mom 10 years ago to bring together her favourites in each category. I photocopied 500 blank recipe sheets and gave her a huge binder. It soon became clear the project was going to take much longer than one year to complete. Mom started writing and writing – even when she got sick," Shari recalled.

"During the more than two years she was in and out of the hospital, I would sit with her and edit the recipes. We talked about what the book would look like and where the proceeds would go. She knew it would be completed. Mom succumbed to leukemia in 2010.

"Our journey of writing, organizing and editing was filled with reminiscing, crying and laughter, and Flo's Kitchen was born," Shari said.

Montreal-born Flo was fearless in the kitchen. Experimenting with recipes was her trademark.

"Many of the sources of the recipes in the cookbook are unknown but include 'Flo Adds,' which are commentaries my mother wrote down when writing out the recipes. You can spot them in the book with a little character sketch of her," said Shari.

Flo's granddaughters remember their Bubbie.

"From a young age, we learned from our Bubbie that cooking was synonymous with love. Bubbie always put so much effort and meticulous care into everything she made. She would slave away in the kitchen for days preparing for even the smallest of family dinners," Lauren Greenglass said.

"She taught us that nothing brought a room full of people together better than a plentiful table of savoury treats and delicious sweets," Erin Greenglass added.

"My mother was all about integrity and family. She never wavered from that, ever," Shari said. "I think that's the lesson she left me and she has most certainly left my daughters, Erin and Lauren, who were very close with their Bubbie and have brought these lessons into their own life."

All proceeds from Flo's Kitchen will support the Travel for Treatment Fund, started by Flo to assist families who have been accepted for treatment at the Hospital for Sick Children.

Flo's Kitchen is available at select stores in Toronto and Montreal. For more information, contact Shari at sharinaimer@rogers.com or message her via Flo's Kitchen Facebook page.

CHAG SAME'ACH from YITZ'S

Gefilte Fish Patties

These are in the fish chapter.

- ❑ 2 tbsp. oil, or more
- ❑ 3 lb. ground fish (mixture of whitefish, pike, pickerel)
- ❑ 3 eggs
- ❑ 2 onions, grated
- ❑ 2 carrots, grated
- ❑ 1 1/2 tsp. white pepper
- ❑ 3 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 tsp. sugar
- ❑ 3/4 cup water
- ❑ 1/4 cup matzah meal, or more

Preheat the oven to 450 or 475. Spread the oil over two nonstick baking sheets

Combine the fish, eggs, onions, carrots, pepper, salt, sugar, water and matzah meal in a large bowl and mix well. Wet your hands in cold water and make small patties from the mixture. Place the patties on the prepared baking sheets.

Place in the oven and, watching carefully, bake until the bottoms look brownish, about 20 minutes. When the bottoms are browned, turn them over with a spatula. If the baking sheets are dry, spread with a little more oil. Bake for another 5 to 10 minutes, or until the patties are done. Remove from the oven and transfer the patties to paper towels. Let cool and get that horseradish ready! Yield: 20 to 24 patties that freeze well.

Flo Adds: I have the butcher or fishmonger mince the fish for me.

Use a minimal amount of oil when making this recipe.

My family would rather have the patties than the traditional cooked fish balls.

For the holidays, I buy 13 pounds of fish. Everybody takes home a "care package."

Gnocchi for Passover? It is possible!

JUDY BART KANCIGOR
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Passover is the most celebrated Jewish holiday. The culinary climax of the holiday is the two seders. But after they fade into memory, the additional matzah-filled days of Passover loom before us.

No bread for a week? No problem! A new cookbook, Meatballs and Matzah Balls from Marcia A. Friedman, has a chapter dedicated to Passover.

Italian by birth and Jewish by choice, Friedman has amassed a feast filled with nostalgic reflections from both traditions.

"It always feels like a brainteaser to create menus for the Passover seders and the remaining days of the holiday," she said, "but it's made me creative."

She has adapted Italian dishes like Chicken Cacciatore and Potato Gnocchi, as well as desserts like Banana Marshmallow Tart.

But gnocchi for Passover? "The first time I made it, no one could believe it's kosher for Passover," she said. "And what a rare pleasure to eat something chewy and pasta-like during the no-bread holiday." ■

Passover Gnocchi With Pepper And Toasted Garlic

- ❑ 2 lb. Yukon gold or butter potatoes, unpeeled, cut into large pieces
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper, to taste
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups matzah cake meal, plus more as needed
- ❑ 1/2 cup potato starch
- ❑ extra-virgin olive oil
- ❑ 1/8 tsp. crushed red pepper flakes, or to taste
- ❑ 6 large garlic cloves, sliced lengthwise into thirds
- ❑ 1 cup freshly grated Parmesan cheese (optional)

Boil potatoes until just tender, about 20 minutes. Drain. Cool, peel, discard skin. Press potatoes through potato ricer or mash into large bowl. Stir in salt and pepper.

Whisk together matzah cake meal and potato starch; fold into potatoes. Knead 1 minute until dough is smooth but still slightly sticky. Add a little cake meal if too moist or sprinkle with water if too dry.

Bring large pot of salted water to boil. Line baking sheet with parchment paper.

Roll small handful of dough into rope about 1/2-in. thick. Slice into 3/4-in. pieces. Gently pinch each piece between your finger and prongs of fork for ribbed texture. Place on prepared parchment. Repeat with all dough. Gnocchi can now be refrigerated or frozen for later use.

Place a thick (about 1/3-in.) layer of olive oil in wide, shallow bowl (or a few pie plates) and set aside. Gently stir half the gnocchi into boiling water. After about a minute, dumplings will start rising to surface. Cook 40 seconds more until al dente, and quickly remove with slotted spoon or small strainer to bowl with oil, stirring gently to coat to prevent sticking. Repeat with remaining gnocchi.

Heat olive oil in large, nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Stir in red pepper flakes and some garlic; place as many gnocchi as will fit in one layer in pan. Cook until both sides are golden brown and crisped, 6 to 10 minutes (remove garlic sooner if too brown). Remove to warmed platter; top with cheese, if using. Repeat with remaining gnocchi. Serve immediately. Serves 4-5. ■

When the kids crave sweets at Pesach...

DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

I happen to love matzah with butter and jam. I eat it during the entire holiday of Passover and never, ever feel like I'm missing anything. Not so with my son and his buddies. Eight days seem interminable to them and to their appetites, so I indulge and bake, as I do every other day of the year. I've tried to keep chemical leaveners to a minimum, to keep with the spirit and the integrity of the holiday. For the blondies, bake them just until they start to form that paper-thin skin on the surface. And the meringues speak for themselves, coffee flavoured, melt in your mouth tender and really good keepers.

Coconut Pecan Blondies

These bars, made rich with butter and brown sugar, should be chilled before they are cut into bars. Feel free to substitute the semisweet chocolate chips with milk chocolate chips or the pecans with almonds or the coconut with caramel bits. The base is more like a canvas, eagerly awaiting the personal inclinations of your brushstroke.

- ❑ 1 1/3 cups potato starch
- ❑ 1/2 cup fine matzah cake meal
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. baking soda
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 1 cup unsalted butter or margarine, softened
- ❑ 1 cup packed light brown sugar
- ❑ 2/3 cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 2 large eggs, at room temperature
- ❑ 1cup semisweet chocolate chips
- ❑ 1 cup chopped pecans
- ❑ 1 cup shredded coconut

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease a 13x9-in. cake pan. Line the pan with parchment paper, so that there is a 2-in. overhang on the long sides.

Whisk together the potato starch, matzah cake meal, soda and salt in a bowl; set aside.

In the bowl of a stand mixer using the paddle attachment, or using hand-held beaters, beat the butter for 1 minute. Add the brown and granulated sugars; beat for 3 minutes or until light and fluffy. One at a time, beat in the eggs, beating well after the first addition before adding the second. Remove the bowl from the stand.

Using a wooden spoon, stir in the potato starch mixture. Stir in the chocolate chips, pecans and coconut. The mixture will be quite sticky.

With wet hands, pat the mixture into the prepared pan. Bake in the centre of the preheated oven until the blondies look light golden and a cake tester comes out with a few moist crumbs clinging to it, 30 to 33 minutes.

Let the blondies cool in the pan on a wire rack for at least two hours. Cover with plastic wrap and then foil to store at room temperature for up to 4 days. Makes 28 blondies.

Espresso Stars

These meringues should be slightly crisp on the outside and meltingly tender on the inside. Bake them just until they start to crisp on the outside. They'll harden as they cool and then get soft again when you store them at room temperature. For an extra-special touch, dip the bases of the meringues in melted bittersweet chocolate.

- ❑ 3 egg whites, at room temperature
- ❑ 1/4 tsp. salt
- ❑ 3/4 cup granulated sugar
- ❑ 1 tsp. vanilla sugar
- ❑ 1 tbsp. instant espresso powder or granules

Preheat the oven to 300. Line two cookie sheets with parchment paper; set aside.

In the bowl of a stand mixer fitted with the whisk attachment, or using hand-held beaters, beat the egg whites with the salt until soft peaks. Very gradually add the sugar, in a thin stream. Beat until stiff but supple, glossy white peaks appear. Remove the mixer from the stand. Fold in the espresso powder, leaving streaks.

Transfer the meringue to a large pastry bag fitted with a star tip. Pipe stars onto the prepared baking sheets. Bake both sheets in the upper and bottom of the preheated oven, rotating their positions halfway through baking, until their surface is just crisp to the touch, about 30 minutes. Cool the meringues on their pans on a wire rack. Meringues can be stored in an airtight container at room temperature for up to 5 days. Makes 28 meringues.

MARRIED WITH KIDS

My daughter, the cheerleader

Lauren Kramer

When my daughter announced she was giving up gymnastics for cheerleading, I admit I was crushed with disappointment. Gymnastics. Now, that's a time-honoured sport with a place in the Olympics and a reputation for demanding discipline and commanding respect. It's hard to say the same thing about cheerleading.

Truth is, I don't get the point of cheerleading. While it requires similar levels of agility and athletic skill to those of gymnastics – at least at the 12-year-old level – cheerleading is often an overtly sexualized dance routine with the purpose of supporting or representing a men's sports team. Rather than focus on athleticism, it's all about sex and beauty.

Ever seen an ugly cheerleader performing at one of those big games? Neither have I. So what's the objective behind cheerleading, what message does it send to the kids and why are so many parents sending their little girls to cheer classes? Who, exactly, are they preparing to cheer?

When your kid badly wants to do something and you know that philosophical reasoning doesn't stand a chance of reaching her, you acquiesce. At least it will keep her fit and active, I reasoned. If she ever wanted to compete at varsity level or beyond, well, that would be the moment to extrapolate my ideological discomfort with cheerleading.

That's how I found myself volunteering at a Mardi Gras-themed cheerleading extravaganza last weekend, as my kid excitedly competed against other cheer groups from all over British Columbia. Thousands of parents and grandparents paid $10 each to join the throngs of onlookers and applaud their kids' teams. I know because I helped man the door and collect the cash.

In my breaks, I watched little girls as young as six strut their stuff, hips thrust to the side as they moved through their choreographed routines. Instructors sat before them on the mats, counting to keep the girls in time and gesticulating with their hands to remind the youngest gals what they were supposed to be doing.

When it was my daughter's group's turn her face lit up with excitement, her heavily eye-shadowed eyes focused in concentration as she kept time and synchronized her moves with those of her teammates. Together they hoisted girls into the air, struck poses, did cartwheels and back flips and performed a complex routine that had been carefully rehearsed for months. Clearly, there were enormous quantities of teamwork, co-operation and mutual support in the air, and when they came first in their level, they were filled with exhilaration.

I'm happy to see her in a supportive environment, one where a group has to work together to achieve success. In a world that's become ever more ego-driven, learning to work together is a crucial skill to nurture. I'm also relieved that in her particular cheer squad there is less emphasis on sexual movements and more on skill, agility and athletic choreography.

Still, I can't help but wonder: what's the definition of success when it comes to cheerleading? A university scholarship based on cheering achievement? A mini-skirted position championing a national sports team and serving as its eye candy? This isn't the kind of future I had in mind for my bright-eyed daughter.

So why am I working the door at a local cheer extravaganza, I asked myself more than once. Because it makes her happy right now, and that's important, too. There's still time to work through the philosophical implications of her cheerleading, and hey, the door to gymnastics won't close for a few more years at least. Maybe when she's a bit older, she'll start thinking philosophically about her after-school activities and questioning what they stand for. Until then, I'll be cautiously applauding from the sidelines. ■

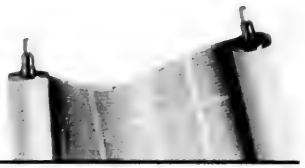
Parshah

Vayikra | Leviticus 1:1 - 5:26



Maharat Abby Brown Scheier argues animal sacrifices can help heal our bodies and souls
Rabbi Denise Handlarski reflects on the difference between intention and action
Rabbi Yirmi Cohen says we can learn humility from the Passover matzah

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier

What does animal sacrifice have to do with loving your neighbour? We're proud that laws such as loving your neighbour and not stealing are found in our Torah. Sometimes, though, we may feel the impulse to skip over the lengthy sacrificial details in the book of Leviticus as it is challenging to relate to laws of animal sacrifice.

One common explanation is that these ritual laws resonated in the ancient world, as this was a way to make animal sacrifice holy. While this may be true historically, Nachmanides (in 13th- century Spain) offers an explanation that transcends time and makes the study of sacrifices a positive educational exercise.

He suggests that the sacrifice was a way to counteract the misdeed. Sins, he says, are "created by our thoughts, speech, and action." Nachmanides explains that specific parts of the animal are burned, representing the parts of our body that lead us to sin, such as the innards that represent our thoughts and desires. Finally, he explains, the blood is sprinkled to show that we have damaged our body and soul with sin.

This approach is at the core of the self-improvement objective inherent in repentance. The offering provides the tools to acknowledge our misguided speech and provides a structure within which we can do self-examination and begin the process of cleansing our body and soul of wrongdoing.

The offering, then, is a tool to heal our body and soul.

Perhaps there is a way to bridge the gap between the archaic, visceral ritual with the sensible communal values found later in Leviticus. Both the ritual act and communal-minded legislations are concerned with our body and soul. It's easy to understand how being honest and providing for the poor can make you a better person. Upon closer examination, one can also understand how offerings can make us better people, as they serve as a model of a healthy body and mind. ■

Maharat Abby Brown Scheier is a Judaic Studies teacher in Montreal, where she lives with her husband and four daughters.

Rabbi Denise Handlarski

Whereas the books of Genesis and Exodus are comprised mainly of narrative, in Leviticus (Vayikra), the text begins to read more like legal code and less like literature (of course, Torah is all this and much more).

Our challenge is to find the narrative behind the legal text. What are these laws meant to accomplish? Whose power is enshrined? What do we know about a society that needed these laws and/or followed them?

The text gives us clues as to how our ancestors lived and the society they hoped to build. For example, in this parshah, we have details about how to perform ritual sacrifices made to ameliorate wrongdoing. The text makes a distinction between wilful acts and accidental ones. Offerings are required in either case, but the distinction is important.

To give a contemporary example: if we are driving a car and cause an accident in which someone is hurt, we may experience guilt and sadness. There may be things we can do to address the hurt we've caused, such as pay for the damage to the other car, ensure that if medical help is needed, it is provided, etc. We are still responsible for hurt we cause by accident, but the hurt is not a reflection of our morality or humanity.

If, however, we hurt someone intentionally, such as by gossiping about them, stealing from them, etc., then we are accountable for that in a different way. We are responsible to repair the damage but also to consider how we might learn a moral/ethical lesson and how we might change ourselves to better reflect our own humanity.

Although the text does not say all of this, the distinction it draws between intention and action should drive us to contemplate its implications in our own lives. ■

Rabbi Denise Handlarski is assistant rabbi with Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism in Toronto.

Rabbi Yirmi Cohen

The highlight of the month of Nisan is Pesach. We clean our homes of any bread, to be kosher for Pesach. Not an easy task.

Bread, being puffy, represents ego and arrogance. So let us sweep and clean out all our spiritual chametz, any negative character traits that we have. Let's be like the matzah, flat and humble.

Let's help our spouses patiently for Pesach. But Pesach is all about the kids, so let's involve them in the Pesach experience.

I love these longer days of Shabbat, so I can tell my kids true stories of our Torah leaders and about Pesach. Judaism and Pesach are so real to them. Thank God for the Cheder Chabad School, where my kids live Judaism. Our kids need to live Judaism at home too, by seeing us as living examples of Torah Jews.

The kids begin the seder with the four questions. The word haggadah comes from the word vehigadeta, as the verse says, "Vehigadeta lebincha" ("And you shall tell your child").

As parents and grandparents, let's learn more Torah so that we can have the right answers to their sincere and innocent questions.

I recommend a great website: Chabad.org, loaded with great information on everything about Judaism. Attend a Torah class! Most of our larger cities have Torah classes.

Living Judaism, and especially Pesach, is not easy, but it is the most beautiful and fulfilling thing in the world – real freedom! So let's prepare for Pesach by learning about Pesach.

Let's ensure that every Jew attends two seders. Let's reach out to every Jew, ensure that they have hand baked matzah for the seder, the preferred mitzvah.

Then we can properly say a "Happy and Kosher Pesach!" May we merit true freedom and joy, with Mashiach in our days! ■

Nimoy's Spock remembered at orchestral screening

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A screening of Star Trek (2009) With Live Orchestra in London, England

Both the late actor Leonard Nimoy and his most famous character Mr. Spock will be remembered at the film screening of Star Trek (2009) With Live Orchestra taking place March 21 at the Sony Centre For The Performing Arts.

The film will be presented on a large screen with composer Michael Giacchino's score performed live by the Kitchener-Waterloo Symphony, conducted by Erik Oschner.

On stage, a tribute to Nimoy and his impact on Star Trek will be given by Giacchino and others to the audience in introducing the film.

"I am particularly touched to have this concert honour the memory of Leonard Nimoy. He was a prolific artist and a generous human being who will continue to inspire us though his iconic portrayal of the ever fascinating Mr. Spock," said Giacchino.

"To Leonard Nimoy,who is the heart and soul and inspiration of Star Trek, I say this: even a man as insightful and brilliant as you could never know how much we miss you," said J.J. Abrams, director of the 2009 Star Trek reboot in which Nimoy had a cameo role.

Although Nimoy acted in other roles in film, stage and television, Mr. Spock is perhaps the most beloved character of the original Star Trek films and television series.

Born in 1931 to Jewish immigrants in Boston, what is less widely known about Nimoy is the influence Judaism and Jewish culture played in his life and that he played many overtly Jewish characters over his career.

Some of Spock's most famous lines, such as "live long and prosper" and "the needs of the many outweigh the needs of the few"and the Vulcan salute, stem from Nimoy's Jewish faith and upbringing.

Nimoy created the salute himself, based on childhood memories of the way the kohanim hold their hand while giving the blessing from Numbers 6:24-26 that is heard weekly at synagogues and temples.

After beginning his stage career as a teen with minor roles in Yiddish theatre in New York, Nimoy's first major role on stage at age 17 was playing a Jewish child in Awake And Sing about the story of a Jewish mother and her children struggling to survive in the Great Depression. In 1971 he played Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof on an eight-week theatrical tour.

Nimoy was nominated for an Emmy Award in 1982 for his portrayal of Golda Meir's husband in the made for television film A Woman Named Golda.

Nimoy also produced a 1991 film in which he played a Holocaust survivor in Never Forget. The story pitted Nimoy's character in a lawsuit against a group of organizations engaged in Holocaust denial.

His most controversial work in the Jewish community came when Nimoy published a photography book The Shekhina Project in 2002. The work examined the feminine aspects of God's presence, inspired by Kabbalah. ■

Star Trek (2009) With Live Orchestra, featuring a tribute to Leonard Nimoy, is on March 21, 7:30 p.m. at the Sony Centre for the Performing Arts, 1 Front St. E., Toronto. For tickets and further information, call 1-855-872-7669 or go to www.sonycentre.ca

Movement may be running out of steam

Measuring the impact of BDS by the number of people who show up for a press conference or boycott goods is misleading, said Levitan. A better gauge of the movement, which in Canada is still in an "awareness-raising" phase, is the number of groups that have adopted some aspect of the campaign.

"It's going to continue to grow and keep its momentum," he said.

The next focus of the BDS campaign will be Israel's multi-billion dollar security industry, which includes surveillance systems, drones and high-tech applications, some of which were refined during the recent Gaza operation, he added.

As proof of how seriously the Jewish world takes the BDS movement, Levitan points to the concerted efforts the Israeli government has taken to oppose it, both within and outside the country.

Saber-Freedman agreed that the Israeli government has devoted a great deal of time and resources to BDS, and, in fact, the Israeli consul-general in Toronto, DJ Schneeweiss, was formerly the Israeli foreign ministry's primary tactician on the issue, but Saber-Freedman thinks the movement is running out of steam.

"There's less coverage [in the media] than there was a few years ago. The temperature is not as hot as it was two to three years ago," she said.

Ultimately, Saber-Freeman said, BDS has failed to gain traction here because it offends Canadians.

"The complete failure to get anything meaningful, speaks to the understanding of most Canadians that this is not a fair or sensible approach." ■

Bret Stephens: 'We're giving Iran the keys to the Middle East

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Bret Stephens is a Pulitzer Prize-winning foreign affairs journalist who is best known for being a former editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post and for his columns in the Wall Street Journal. Stephens visited Toronto March 11 to speak at Beth Sholom Synagogue about Israel and the West. The CJN spoke with him in an exclusive interview.

Columnist says the United States is laying the ground for intensified sectarian conflict.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's speech to the U.S. Congress March 3 was very impressive, although one could say it polarized relations between Israel and the U.S. even further. Did Netanyahu's speech do Israel any favours politically?

I think the verdict is still out, quite frankly. I thought it was a tremendously effective speech. I think any fair-minded person listening to that speech would have heard perhaps the most powerful single case ever made against a prospective nuclear deal with Iran, for the various reasons that I think he laid out very effectively. It's a negotiation that gives Iran an opportunity to race toward the bomb illicitly, but also gives it an opportunity to acquire a bomb at a slightly slower rate, illicitly, illegally and openly.

And I think he rubbished the conceit that intelligence agencies could know with any real accuracy that Iran was about to break out toward a nuclear capability. I think he also brought home the key point that diplomacy with dictatorships – especially a dictatorship like Iran – never works. In that sense, looking at the speech itself, it was a very effective piece of rhetoric.

The second part of the question is: what has it actually achieved? It's too soon to say. Will it sway votes in Congress? Or will it harden and bring more Democrats into the president's camp? How will it affect politics in Israel? How did it affect Israeli thinking? These are questions that will remain open.

In his speech, Netanyahu explained that more sanctions on Iran are needed to ensure a better deal. Would that realistically be enough to get Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions or stall the program?

To say the idea that sanctions, military threats and other coercive measures are antithetical to diplomacy is, I think, a mistake. They are handmaids to diplomacy. They are, in many ways, what makes diplomacy works. Diplomacy functions almost inevitably in the shadow of some implicit threat, especially when it's a diplomacy with a dictatorship. We're not negotiating a treaty with Canada or Holland, with responsible, democratic, law-abiding states. We're negotiating a treaty with a state that demonstrates, time and again, why it can't and shouldn't be trusted.

It depends on the type of sanctions and it depends on the strictness with which it is applied. The president always boasted that it was only the tough sanctions that brought the Iranians to the table in the first place. Not surprisingly, as the threat of those sanctions has receded, the Iranians have become more intransigent, not less. Now, if you have serious sanctions, threats that would not only further cut off Iran from the world's financial system, but would hit them where it hurts most – which is to say oil exports, at a time when oil is selling at roughly half of what it was a year ago – you might get Iran's attention and their compliance in a way that you simply can't if they sense that you're prepared to give up everything anyway.

What do you now propose U.S. President Barack Obama do with these negotiations? Is it realistic at all for the Obama administration to reach a deal with Iran that eliminates all uranium enrichment?

It's almost useless to propose anything to the Obama administration, because they're so hell-bent on getting a deal. What I would like is for the United States to, quite frankly, walk back the offer that seems to be on the table in Geneva. It's a terrible offer, as far as western interests are concerned, not just American interests. It's an offer that gives Iran a robust nuclear infrastructure that does very little realistically to prevent them from acquiring the know-how, the means and the technology to acquire nuclear weaponry in a time of their own choosing. And it's one that removes western pressure at the very moment when Iran is clearly trying to seize strategic opportunities throughout the Middle East – in Beirut, in Damascus, in Baghdad and in Sanaa. We are giving Iran not just the keys to a nuclear capability. We're giving them the keys to the Middle East in a way that is almost certain to terrify and even radicalize the Sunni Arab world. We are not only giving up too much to Iran, but we are laying the ground for intensified sectarian conflict in the Middle East in a way that is scary to think about.

You recently wrote about the evaporating support for Israel among liberal Democrats. With so many pro-Israel American Jews disillusioned by the Obama administration, do you think Israel is going to be a more prominent issue in the 2016 election, as the party has to win back some goodwill?

Israel should be a liberal cause, because Israel has always defended and enshrined and enlarged core liberal values. I don't simply mean democracy. I mean human rights, women's rights, gay rights, concern for the environment and concern for minorities. The natural liberal position should be a strongly pro-Israel position. The reality is that that has withered in recent years, for a variety of reasons.

The Democratic party, or too much of the Democratic party, has been captured by a progressive wing that treats Israel as a pariah state or a quasi-pariah state, and that is more interested in peace at any price than it is in defending a liberal state against its enemies. That is something on which Democrats, Jewish or not, ought to reflect upon. It's something that American Jews who have reflexively voted Democratic ought to reflect on, as well, not simply because of their pro-Israel sensitivities, but because of their liberal sensitivities.

During last summer's war, self-identified liberal Democrats were split on the question of whether Hamas or Israel was more to blame for the war. When you're a liberal Democrat who thinks that Hamas is the wronged party in a war, something is very wrong with your perception of events and your moral priorities.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper has a very pro-Israel stance. What do you and other Americans engaged in pro-Israel advocacy think of him?

I think most American Jews, at least those who are remotely well informed, understand that the best western ally that Israel has today is Canada. The support has been well noted and well appreciated. I think the performance of Canadian foreign policy in the 9/11 era has been magnificent in terms of what it contributed to the effort in Afghanistan, the sacrifices the Canadian soldiers made in Kandahar. I remember the first time I ever had a Tim Hortons coffee was in the Kandahar air base – which was the best coffee on base, I might add.

Harper has brought a kind of clarity with him not just when it comes to Israel but when it comes to a real civilizational struggle that involves Canada as much as it does any other western nation. I think it was underscored with the attack on Parliament in Ottawa. All of that I think is well recognized in the United States. People look at Stephen Harper, I think, as a guy who's punching way above his weight in international affairs, and that's in a good sense. A lot of us, sort of in a throwback to the Vietnam era, we so admire the foreign policy of Canada that we want to leave the U.S. and move and be in a country where we actually like the foreign policy of the government. But we'll see how long that lasts. ■

Pompeii and the Jews

Backstory

ALEX GROPPER

Just recently the Royal Ontario Museum announced a major exhibit on Pompeii. For those that have never been there, Pompeii is an evocative place. It offers an unparalleled view of a Roman city at the height of the empire in the first century CE, thanks to the fact that the city was almost perfectly preserved for the better part of 2,000 years by the explosion of Mount Vesuvius in 79 CE.

Perhaps even more importantly, Pompeii also highlights the fragility of human life and accomplishment, showing how it can all be snuffed out in the historical blink of an eye.

Pompeii's discovery in the 18th century ignited a firestorm of interest in the ancient world. It ranks as one of the greatest archeological discoveries of all time, giving us a unique view into the ancient Mediterranean world at the height of Rome's power in the first century CE.

In Europe, Pompeii's discovery sparked a renewed interest in ancient Rome and led to the neoclassical style in art and architecture. This new vogue even crossed the Atlantic and had a major impact on emerging styles. In the United States neoclassicism was referred to as the federal style, reaching its zenith with the Capitol building housing the U.S. Congress. That should really come as no surprise since the newly created United States was strongly influenced by the ancient Romans, even naming their upper house the Senate, after its ancient Roman counterpart.

What many people do not realize is that there appears to be a visible Jewish presence at Pompeii. A few have even said that the obliteration of Pompeii was divine retribution for the destruction of the Second Temple by the Romans. Amazingly this happened nine years earlier on almost the same day as Pompeii was wiped out by Vesuvius.

The evidence indicates that the majority of Jews arrived in Pompeii after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE (although it is possible that there had been a Jewish population at Pompeii even earlier). This was a catastrophic period in Jewish history with large numbers of Jews from Judea being deported throughout the Roman Empire. Many people wound up as slaves, especially in Rome, where they were used to build that greatest of ancient structures, the Flavian Amphitheater, more popularly known as the Coliseum. (In an ironic historical twist of fate, many Italians coming from southern Italy after the Second World War worked for Jewish builders and helped build cities such as Toronto into the vibrant centres that they are today).

In Pompeii, the epigraphic evidence from surviving inscriptions shows that many of the Jews had a lower socio-economic status. This is not uncommon since many were enslaved as a result of the Jewish Revolt; however, others were freedmen, and there were even prostitutes amongst the group.

Nevertheless there were some Jews who were well off in Pompeii, such as Fabius Eupor, who had the title of princes libertinorum. One inscription refers to an individual called, interestingly enough, Iudaikos, who was a wine merchant, a profession that Jews practised throughout the history of the Roman Empire. The evidence appears to show that Jews even played a role in the municipal life of the city. Another inscription refers to Sodom and Gomorrah, and may even have been scribbled as the volcano was snuffing out the life of the city.

The excavations at Pompeii have given us a bird's-eye view of a little known Jewish community of the ancient Diaspora. They also show how far afield the Diaspora had spread throughout the Roman Empire, with some scholars believing that Jews may have made up as much as 10 per cent of the Empire's population. ■

Orange Mousse In Chocolate

Chocolate mould:

- 10 ounces bittersweet chocolate, chopped

Mousse:

- 1 cup cold water
- 2 tbsp. unflavoured gelatin
- 8 egg yolks, lightly beaten
- juice from 1 orange
- grated peel from 1 orange
- 1 cup plus 1/4 cup sugar
- 10 egg whites
- 1/2 tsp. salt
- 2 tbsp. Sabra liqueur
- 1 (10-ounce) can unsweetened frozen orange juice concentrate, thawed
- grated orange peel for garnish

To make the chocolate mould, put the chocolate pieces in the top of a double boiler and melt over low heat.

With a 3- to 4-inch wide paint brush, paint an 8- or 9-inch springform pan with one-quarter to one-third of the melted chocolate. When well coated, refrigerate for a few minutes to set. Repeat with 3 or 4 more coats of chocolate. You can make this mould a week in advance and fill it with the mousse the day before serving and refrigerate.

To make the mousse, put the cold water in a small bowl and sprinkle the gelatin over the water. Let it stand for 10 minutes to dissolve.

Put the egg yolks in the top of a double boiler and add the orange juice concentrate, orange peel and 1 cup of sugar, and cook, stirring, until the mixture is slightly thick and coats the back of a wooden spoon. Add the gelatin and stir until dissolved.

Transfer the orange mixture to a large bowl, stir and set aside to cool. When cooled to room temperature, stir in the liqueur and refrigerate for 15 minutes.

Put the egg whites in another bowl and beat until frothy, and then add the ¼ cup of sugar and the salt and continue to beat until stiff.

When the orange mixture has cooled, fold it into the egg white mixture and mix well.

To remove the chocolate mould from the springform pan, put a large serving plate over the pan and invert. Dampen a dish towel with hot water and wrap it around the pan. Slowly loosen the rim of the pan and remove. With the edge of a sharp, pointed knife, slowly loosen the bottom of the pan (which is now on top) until it can be removed. Spoon the orange mousse into the chocolate mould and refrigerate until ready to serve.

To serve, garnish with grated orange peel. To slice through the mould, use a sharp knife heated with hot water.

Flo Adds: You can also spoon the mousse into individual serving dishes or parfait glasses, or you can make small chocolate moulds with cups. Yield: 6 to 8 servings. ■

Kosher wines for Pesach and all year round

JAY BUCHSBAUM
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

We all know that wine comes from grapes, but how is wine made? Simply put (and it isn't that simple), grapes are picked and the natural sugar in the grapes is fermented by yeast. This fermentation changes the sugar into alcohol, transforming grape juice into wine.

So can anyone go to the supermarket, buy a bunch of grapes, crush them, add some yeast and convert the grape juice into wine? The answer is yes, but it isn't going to be very good.

Today, the wines we drink are made from grapes that are not usually pleasant to snack on (unlike the seedless ones we buy at the supermarket), as wine grape berries are very small, their skins are thick and chewy, and they are loaded with seeds. But it is these grapes that make excellent wines.

Wine falls into several categories, such as dry, semi-sweet, sweet or sparkling. There is also white wine, red wine or rosé. So you can have a sweet red wine, a sparkling rosé or a dry white. Wine can be made almost in any style.

So which is best for the Pesach seder? Well, that depends on personal preference. The most important rule to remember when drinking wine is that there are no rules. Wine, just like food, should be consumed only if you like it and in whatever style you like. So, don't drink a dry red just because someone told you to — you wouldn't eat a rare steak if you prefer well-done, would you?

Most people naturally prefer sweet to dry. Having grown up on soft drinks, fruit juice, sweetened iced tea and soda, our preference is for a sweet beverage rather than a dry or bitter one.

For this reason, most people start out enjoying sweet wines such as Bartenura Moscato. Two wines in the semi-dry category that are a great next step for many people are Jeunesse Cabernet Sauvignon and By W Red. These are made with traditional wine grapes, and while they are made in the style of dry wines, they are semi-dry wines that have a hint of sweetness to them and don't taste as bitter to beginner wine drinkers.

The obvious next step for any wine lover is to gain an appreciation for dry wines. This usually starts with "New-World" wines from places such as California, Israel or Spain, as these New-World wines are more fruit-driven and, given their fruitiness, don't taste as dry, even though they usually are.

And though many wine lovers might stop at this point, others progress to "Old-World" wines from places such as France or Italy. These Old-World wines are generally drier, more earthy and less fruit driven. These wines do, however, pair best with various types of food.

As someone who likes all kinds of wine, I might set up my arba kosot (four cups)in the following manner:

- low alcohol
- medium-bodied red wine
- full-bodied red wine
- sweet and light.

In more detail, I would want to start my first cup with something low in alcohol but tasty, like the Kedem Cream Malaga, Joyvin Red or Joyvin White. These are under seven per cent alcohol and won't make me too sleepy before the seder has really even gotten underway.

For my second cup, I'm ready to drink a decent wine, but I wouldn't want to overdo it. A nice, medium-bodied red wine such as the Barkan Classic Cabernet Sauvignon or Shiraz, Ben Ami Cabernet Sauvignon or Jeunesse Cabernet Sauvignon for people who prefer something with a touch of sweetness.

By the third cup, I'm ready for a bigger wine, and I'd opt for a big and bold Cabernet Sauvignon or cab-based blend such as the Herzog Reserve Napa Cabernet Sauvignon, Weinstock Cellar Select Cabernet Sauvignon or the Petite Castel blend from Israel.

To finish things off, I want to go with something on the sweeter side – it is dessert time after all. Moscato works great here and Bartenura's "blue bottle" moscato is the most popular, but there are several on the market such as the "Moscato by W" from California. A great alternative to moscato is Bartenura's Malvasia, which is a beautiful rose colour with notes of berries and flowers. All are refreshing and work great with dessert.

So whether dry or sweet, red or white, make sure to drink wines that you enjoy, and have a wonderful and wine-filled yom tov. ■

Barak thanks Ottawa, and go ahead – #AskHamas anything

Envoy says Israel grateful for UN help

Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak thanked Canada last week for helping his country join the United Nations' western group of nations in Geneva a year ago, saying it will help Israel seek a temporary seat on the UN Security Council. Membership in the group allows Israel to join a number of other important UN bodies and helps it defend itself against some 20 annual motions condemning it in the General Assembly, Barak told Canadian Press in an interview. A Security Council seat would be a first for Israel.

Reform rabbi makes history

The Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR), the rabbinical arm of the Reform movement, installed its first openly gay president, Rabbi Denise Eger, at its annual convention last week in Philadelphia. The founding rabbi of the Kol Ami synagogue in Los Angeles, Rabbi Eger, 55, was ordained in 1988 and came out in an interview with the Los Angeles Times in 1990. She is engaged to be married. She also was the first female and openly gay president of the Southern California Board of Rabbis, and the founding president of the Lesbian, Gay & Bisexual Interfaith Clergy Association. Rabbi Eger officiated at the first legal wedding in California for a lesbian couple. Her inauguration was followed by a session marking the 25th anniversary of CCAR's resolution on homosexuality and the rabbinate, which called for the ordination of gay rabbis.

Terror group gets social

A five-day "Ask Hamas" social media campaign launched earlier this month in an apparent attempt to soften the Gaza-based terror group's image backfired when Twitter users responded with mockery. Among the unanswered tweets to the Palestinian Islamist group were such things as "What is the proper way to strap a suicide vest onto a child? #AskHamas" and "#AskHamas What date is the next #GayPrideParade in #Gaza?" Another wondered: "Will you be publicly executing the person that came up with the idea to #AskHamas?" ■

Rabbi speaks out on prenup

The article on the Israeli pre-nuptial agreement was very informative. Unfortunately, the headline is misleading ("Israeli prenup to help agunot likely not effective in Canada," March 12).

It is true that Canadian courts will not uphold a financial component to a get. Having a court uphold a monetary payment to induce a get is a very strong tool. And I am close to finalizing such a document that will be acceptable to Canadian courts and rabbis. But that is far from the only help a halachic prenup can offer. It can set expectations before the marriage starts that withholding a get is never acceptable. It represents a solemn promise the couple makes to the rabbi that they will treat each other with respect even when the relationship is not working. And it teaches the entire community that we will not tolerate causing even one woman to become an agunah.

These goals by themselves are very powerful. The objections raised by a few rabbis are easily surmountable, especially when we keep in mind that using this document can virtually prevent a woman becoming an agunah – an imperative in our time.

I urge every rabbi to use my current document and I urge every couple getting married – and their parents, grandparents, and friends – to insist on it. If your rabbi can't do it, contact me (rabbi@adath.ca) and I will gladly help, at no cost. I would never allow anyone I love to get married without this protection. Please do the same.

Bibi and Masada

In the wake of the large victory by Benjamin Netanyahu, I have been remembering my first visit to Israel and Masada. The zealots held their ground until they committed suicide. It was the peacemakers who told the story.

With the declaration of no two-state solutions, I hope we are not heading toward a 58th-century Masada.

All parties wanted peace

Rabbi Dow Marmur uses the divisive term "anti-peace" ("Israeli women wage peace," Feb. 26) when referring to right-wing women candidates who do not agree with Tzipi Livni and Zahava Galon, who speak on behalf of the left-wing "peace" camp.

All candidates in the election wished to have peace – the left-wing and Arab parties believe appeasing the Palestinians will achieve this. The right-wing parties do not.

Jews need allies

Jewish communities and organizations around the world have been fighting anti-Semitism in the same way for hundreds of years. It is simply not working. But with only 14 million Jews worldwide, how can we expect to effectively counter the hatred and falsehoods spread by hundreds of millions of anti-Semites? We need allies.

The place to find them is within communities that do not have a history of hating Jews or a predisposition to be anti-Israel. Unfortunately, that is not Europe. Even in a post-Holocaust world, European Jews cannot count on safety, security and protection under the law. While we must continue pushing for change in Europe, we need a more global approach. Asia is the place to start.

Asia is rising as an economic powerhouse whose sphere of influence will only continue to grow. As well, Jews and Asians have always had a mutual respect grounded in a set of shared values that are family-centred, place a premium on education and celebrate progress.

Canadian universities have a significant Asian student population. We should send these future leaders of their communities to visit Israel.

There they will observe a progressive state that respects diversity, human rights, and the rule of law. The students will take this positive experience and return home as ambassadors for Israel and the Jewish People.

We also need to send Jewish speakers to Asian organizations to further dialogue and explore opportunities for joint educational, social, and philanthropic pursuits.

My hope is that this exercise will go beyond the theoretical, and that real tangible projects and success stories will strengthen the bonds of friendship between us.

RABBI·2·RABBI

The value of interfaith dialogue

Is it only useful when it's about issues of mutual interest, or are deeper theological conversations possible now that ties aren't characterized by coercion and violence?

RABBI N. DANIEL KOROBKIN
BETH AVRAHAM YOSEPH CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI LISA GRUSHCOW
TEMPLE EMANU-EL-BETH SHOLOM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Grushcow: This month, we honour our docents at our temple. They run a program that welcomes approximately 2,500 students to the temple each year. Most of them are francophone, and none of them are Jewish. For many, it's their first time in a synagogue.

Also this spring, I'm doing a sermon exchange with a young Protestant minister as well as a Catholic priest, and going to Vancouver to speak at a conference on religion in a secular world. These activities remind me how important interfaith work has always been to my congregation and the Reform movement.

What role does interfaith dialogue play for you and your synagogue?

Rabbi Korobkin: Interfaith work has historically been a double-edged sword for the Jewish People. Such dialogue was often forced upon our people and resulted in exile, pogroms and worse. That is why an aversive attitude persists to this day in our community.

I applaud your efforts at educating non-Jewish children about Judaism and the Jewish community. This can only help stem the tide of anti-Semitism, and I have done the same. Doing pulpit exchanges with Christian counterparts, on the other hand, is where we'd have to part ways. For one thing, traditional Judaism restricts entering a church for any reason. Secondly, discussions of theology and the details of each other's faith is the one area that we have found to be counterproductive, and even at times dangerous.

We find dialogue most useful when we can discuss issues of mutual interest, such as neighbourhood security, Israel, and caring for the poor and vulnerable in our communities. These efforts deserve mutual respect and co-operation, since we can accomplish so much more when working together.

Rabbi Grushcow: I think we need to differentiate between coerced medieval disputations and modern interfaith dialogue. The restrictions you speak of are based on an entirely different time and place. When we enter interfaith dialogue now, we do so as equal and willing partners.

I agree that there are many good things we can do together outside an explicitly religious or theological context. For example, our temple takes part every year in an interfaith eco-action project, in which members of different religious groups team up to clean neighbourhoods in Montreal.

At the same time, I don't think we need to shy away from deeper encounters.

The traditional restrictions on entering a church or engaging in theological conversations come from an era when the church had life-and-death powers over Jews, and the relationship between us was characterized by coercion and violence. That is no longer the case.

When I speak in a church or invite a Christian clergyperson into our synagogue, we learn from each other's insights into our shared sacred texts. We gain a deeper understanding of the similarities and differences in our belief and practice, and through this, we gain mutual respect. Talking about God with Christians is not threatening. My belief system is strong enough that I can engage in conversation without worrying about conversion, and our dialogue partners don't proselytize. My religious life would be poorer without our conversations.

Rabbi Korobkin: We can only grow through deeper understanding of each other's faith. But there's nothing "medieval" about persecutions and blood libels that are based on anti-Semitic theology. The Mendel Beilis blood libel in Russia, for example, was only a century ago. The Protocols of the Elders of Zion is experiencing a resurgence in popularity throughout the world.

Soon, you and I will start our seders with, "This is the bread of our affliction… Let all who are hungry come and eat!" Some scholars understand that the historical basis of this invitation is to dispel the blood libels that were recurring throughout Jewish history. "Here's our matzah," we are saying. "There's no Christian blood, and you can see and taste it for yourself!" Indeed, as Easter coincides with Pesach, whole sections of the seder liturgy may be understood as polemics against those who have accused the Jews of having killed their lord.

So, while I agree that we thankfully don't have to fear our Christian counterparts anymore and agree that one can certainly gain from the ecumenical dialogue of which you speak, I also feel, as George Santayana said, "Those who do not remember the past are condemned to repeat it." ■

Members of the Likud party meet with Israeli President Reuven Rivlin at the president's house in Jerusalem on March 22 as Rivlin began consulting political leaders to decide who to task with trying to form a new government. The Likud party, led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, has a majority of 67 Knesset members supporting his effort to form the next government.

Politics is ephemeral, Judaism is eternal

In the aftermath of the Israeli election, one thing appears clear: Benjamin Netanyahu will assume his fourth term as prime minister because a majority of Israelis – albeit a slim one – believe he is the best person for the job. But after a gruelling campaign, there remains a litany of unanswered questions: How will U.S. President Barack Obama react to his frenemy's victory? Will Bibi's continued leadership hinder Israel on the international stage? Is there any hope for peace with the Palestinians? How will Israel's Arab citizens react to Netanyahu's controversial comments on election day? What's next for the leftist camp?

The list is long, and the answers are not apparent. In some cases, they may not become clear for years to come. In others, the solutions will likely appear naturally over time. Some questions could become moot with the shifting of political winds (Obama may yet have enough time to strike a nuclear deal with Iran, but two years hence there will be a new face, and perhaps a new approach, in the White House). Netanyahu himself will be called upon to find answers as well – and if he can't, Israelis may decide his time has passed for good.

There is, however, an important question that must not be left unanswered. How do we as Jews move forward? For all the uncertainty this election has produced, one thing is plain: we must not allow it to divide us as a people. There is too much at stake for all of us, for Judaism in Israel and around the world. When we are divided, we are weakened, and there is no time for weakness.

Judaism does not require uniformity. As Rabbi Dow Marmur writes in this week's CJN, "No individual, however exalted her or his office, and no organization, however pretentious its title, can claim to speak for us all, or even for most of us." This is one of our religion's great strengths. It explains why Israel remains an island of democracy in a region characterized by extremism and intolerance (and why Netanyahu's remarks about Arab voters stung so many, including those who might otherwise support him).

Jews don't need to all think the same way, and clearly we don't. We can have our own disagreements – about how we interpret our sacred texts, what religion means in a modern world and, yes, whether Bibi Netanyahu is the right man to lead Israel. Debate is healthy for us, and it's in our nature.

But when all is said and done, we ought to try to centre ourselves, to reaffirm the ties that bind us together. Because we need them – we need each other. There's no better reminder how crucial it is that we stand together than the coming Passover holiday season. This is the time of year when we celebrate the birth of the Jewish nation, when we remember how we walked shoulder to shoulder out of slavery and into freedom.

The turmoil of this election will pass, just like all the others before it and those to come. Politics is ephemeral. Judaism is not. Let's make sure not to confuse the two. ■ — YONI

ESSAY

How stuttering helped me to accept and embrace my adversities

Moe Mernick

Growing up in Toronto, I could have seemed like an ordinary kid. But there was something that made me sharply stand out.

I stuttered. A lot.

It began when I was three years old. My parents were told to ignore it – as "merely a stage in a child's speech development," speech experts would say, and cite the statistics that most children grow out of it.

But I didn't grow out of it. In fact, it only got worse.

Not only was it daunting for me to speak up in class or introduce myself to new friends, but I would often get laughed at when I could not even say my own name or the simple word "hello."

My mom tried to give me positive encouragement. "Moe," she would tell me, "you have so much going for you…"

But invariably, I would respond that it was all worthless if I couldn't speak.

I was miserable. I constantly wondered to myself: What would life have in store for me? How would I ever pass a job interview? What girl would want to marry me? What will I sound like when reading bedtime stories to my kids?

After numerous failed attempts to find a speech therapist who fit my needs, a match was finally made. A dozen years of therapy helped, enabling me to function on a daily basis – some days more, some days less. My therapy often consisted of fabricating real-life circumstances while in the stutter-friendly comfort zone of my therapist's office. We made phone calls and visited stores together, practising words with which I had difficulty. It gave me hope of normalcy, and I felt accepted, regardless of how my words were expressed.

Moe Mernick

But I never embraced or fully accepted my stutter. I worried it might be my companion forever. I could not come to terms with the fact that my awkward, embarrassing and inhibiting speech habits might accompany me through life.

Fast forward to today.

I have been flown around across Canada, the United States, central Europe and Australia to lecture to Jewish education programs. I received an MBA from Tel Aviv University, worked at Deloitte as a strategy consultant and trained senior-level executives on their presentation skills. These days, I work at a cool start-up and mentor entrepreneurs at a technology accelerator. I live in Israel, with my wife and children.

Indeed, I am living my dream. But what happened?

Therapy helped. My supportive family helped, too. But the ultimate turning point happened when I began to accept my stutter. No longer did I have to reject it or hide from it – it was simply a part of who I was. We all have our challenges – stuttering was mine. It was finally time to live.

Thus began my journey to discover my inner voice.

Years later, I met a married couple who had just discovered their three-year-old daughter had developed a stutter. I advised them as follows:

As young as your daughter may be, she can pick up on the fact that her parents are extremely worried about her newly developed speech pattern. As such, she will probably become hesitant to speak up because she won't want to scare you. It is easier for her to keep her mouth closed than to watch your panicked facial expressions when she can't seem to get her words out.

The more she chooses not to speak, the more anxiety she will build around speaking. Each time she decides that it is safer to not risk the stutter, she, in effect, is subconsciously developing a mental block against expressing those words.

You must create a "safe" environment for her. She must feel that you unconditionally love her and will not be upset or judge her if she begins to stutter. You and your husband must become comfortable with the fact that your daughter may stutter for the rest of her life. And it is OK.

The ball is in your court. The more accepting you become, the less your daughter will feel as though you are trying to change her.

Ironically, by becoming comfortable with the fact that your daughter may stutter permanently, you are providing her with the best chance to overcome it. The safe haven of your home will hopefully help her develop a strong self-confidence. You will thereby significantly increase the probability that your daughter's stutter will be but a blip on her early-childhood radar screen.

Please note, though, that you cannot expect her to overcome it. That is, in effect, the opposite of true acceptance of her stutter. She will sniff out your insincerity. Therefore, I strongly suggest that you and your husband have an important conversation, whereby you recognize the limit of control you hold over every aspect of your daughter's stutter.

I am confident that you will see results. Because even if she does not stop stuttering, your relationship with your daughter will no longer be one of deflated hopes and frustration, but rather one of idyllic parental love and unwavering support. This can only be beneficial for all three of you.

I was excited to hear that this little girl's stutter faded away the following year. But it was even more powerful to receive the feedback that my advice was both novel and refreshing. I was lauded for my unique approach to stuttering, and praised for having such a healthy attitude. That was meaningful to me, especially after years of frustration and anger over my own stuttering.

But it also irked me. Why had this family not heard this advice from others? Was my approach that unique? And then I realized that what I was saying didn't only apply to stuttering.

We all face our own unique adversity and choose our response. It is not about conquering our challenges, but rather about embracing them, improving our self-esteem, and leading happier, more meaningful lives as a result.

As American theologian Reinhold Niebuhr said, "God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference."■

Moe Mernick was born and raised in Toronto. He recently made aliyah with his wife and children, and works for a high-tech startup in Tel Aviv. www.indiegogo.com/projects/the-gift-of-stuttering/

Jewish high schools struggle with enrolment

LILA SARICK
lsarick@thecjn.ca

Jewish high schools across the country, buffeted by forces beyond their control – including rising costs and shrinking enrolment – are looking for new ways to survive in a competitive landscape.

The announcement last month that Ottawa's main community Jewish high school was closing because of low enrolment sent a shock wave of fear and sadness across the country.

"It scares the hell out of me," said Rory Paul, head of Winnipeg's Gray Academy of Jewish Education and CEO of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education.

Gray Academy, with 170 students in grades 9 to 12, is in much better shape than Ottawa's high school, where only 24 students are currently enrolled.

But in Winnipeg, as in other schools, principals and administrators are aggressively wooing new students and re-examining their programs.

Pluralistic, co-educational, Jewish high schools can be found in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Montreal and Toronto. Except for Vancouver, they are all facing declining enrolments, but the problems and solutions vary in each community.

Winnipeg, which has a community of about 13,000 Jews, similar in size to Ottawa's, had fairly stable enrolment until this year, when 50 students who were registered didn't show up in September. Their parents, recent immigrants to Canada, had found better jobs outside of Winnipeg and moved over the summer.

"That was a completely unexpected phenomenon," Paul said. In response, the school has hired its first director of admissions to look at student recruitment and retention.

Gray, like other day schools, is being hit by two factors, Paul said. "The cost of Jewish education is increasing and the ability to pay or the interest in paying is waning," he said. "The second issue is there's less of an interest in Jewish day school education in the secular world."

On the financial front, except for in Ontario, Jewish high schools across the country receive some form of government funding. In Winnipeg, Gray receives half of what public schools get, and without that money, the school would likely not exist, Paul said.

Winnipeg's Gray Academy, which has 170 high school students, is in better shape than others.

Meanwhile, schools are working hard to convince parents that Jewish education is worth the investment.

"There was a time that Jewish curriculum was the value-added proposition people were looking for," said Paul. Now "we have to have the 'Jewish curriculum, plus' – that's what people are looking for."

A decade ago, Gray Academy was one of the city's first schools (and one of the first Jewish schools) to go through a rigorous accreditation process with the group, Canadian Accredited Independent Schools.

"That accreditation was a parent's assurance that the school was of the highest quality," Paul said.

High schools in both Montreal and Toronto are also facing declining enrolments, although their problems differ.

Montreal has four Jewish high schools for grades 7 to 11, varying in size from 205 to 427 students and divided by language and levels of observance. Forecasts predict that the student populations in all the schools will be declining, said Shimshon Hamerman, director of formal education at Montreal's Bronfman Jewish Education Centre.

"The trends are not looking pretty. The community is working hard to improve the situation."

A new subsidy program, squarely aimed at middle-class families has been launched, and federation funding has been allocated to encourage excellence in the schools.

While it would be cost effective for Montreal to amalgamate its small high schools, it's a difficult proposition, since the schools have diverse philosophies and different forms of governance.

"It will require quite a leader [to create a school] where all these ideologies are reflected," said Hamerman. "Or the numbers will decline, so everyone will put some water in their wine."

Montreal, like Winnipeg, is battling two formidable obstacles. The first is the shrinking size of the anglophone Jewish community. The second is a waning commitment to Jewish education.

"We don't have issues of quality of education. We have issues of identity," Hamerman said. "I don't think we're doing a good enough job of instilling identity. Until that changes, we're in a downward spiral."

In Toronto, numbers have also dipped precipitously at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, from a high of 1,500 students six years ago to 1,161 today, on two campuses. Next year, enrolment will hover between 1,000 and 1,100, said head of school Rabbi Lee Buckman, who arrived at TanenbaumCHAT 18 months ago.

The problem is one of demographics. Comparing census data from 2001 and 2011 shows that the number of Jewish school-aged children in the Toronto area has dropped by nine per cent, or by about 3,000 kids, said Daniel Held, executive director of the Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education.

The commitment to Jewish education has not wavered, Held said. About one-third of Jewish children attend day school, a percentage that has remained consistent over the years. Meanwhile, the percentage of Jewish youths attending TanenbaumCHAT continues to grow.

To compensate for dropping enrolment, the school is intensifying its recruitment efforts, hoping to attract students who are not currently in day school, but could enter high school in specialized classes, Rabbi Buckman said.

The high school also maintains close ties with the numerous elementary Jewish day schools, to encourage students and parents to consider day school education after Grade 8.

Is freedom just for us?

Avrum Rosensweig

An injustice of epic proportion has occurred in our country, Canada, on our watch.

A lawyer by the name of Viktor Hohots took freedom away from close to 5,000 Roma refugees to Canada. Three of those individuals were Josezf, Timea and Lulu Pusuma. Like the other 5,000, the Pusumas are no longer in Canada. Their whereabouts are not for public consumption, but suffice it to say, they are not feeling safe.

According to a report I received from Rev. Alexa Gilmour, the minister of the Windermere Church, where the Pusumas found sanctuary for 18 months, "On March 2 of this year, the Law Society made a finding of professional misconduct after Mr. Hohots had officially admitted to them all of the major accusations against him made by the Pusumas and several other refugees who had filed complaints against him."

Rev. Gilmour shared with me a message from the sanctuary committee and a multifaith group, all of whom fought on behalf of the Pusumas, that now all that remains for the Law Society of Upper Canada is to decide how to punish or discipline Hohots "for his misconduct and inadequate representation of some of society's most vulnerable people."

In a March 3 story on CBC Radio's Metro Morning in Toronto, Rev. Gilmour spoke about the Pusumas' plight and how the law society took three years to bring Hohots to justice. Similarly, Andrew Brouwer, the Pusumas' current lawyer spoke about the travesty committed by Hohots and how it is incumbent on Canadian society, and particularly the Canadian government, to now allow the Pusumas back into Canada.

A March 2 Toronto Star article about this case reported about the government's disappointing response. Rather than commending the Pusuma family for testifying against Hohots, Stephen Harper's government condemned them for seeking sanctuary. Hohots would likely have continued to operate in a fraudulent manner if not for the Pusumas' testimony.

Rev. Gilmour's message to me continued, "It is a good day for justice, which we celebrate even as our hearts break knowing how many lost their right to live in a safe country because of this lawyer's greedy misconduct. May today's victory encourage and inspire all who believe a kinder and more just world is possible."

The Roma walked hand-in-hand with our people, the Jewish People, in Auschwitz. Adolf Hitler hated them as much as he hated us. Today they are besieged by neo-Nazis and many "good" Europeans once again. They are without a homeland and are considered "none is too many" by our Canadian government. The percentage of Roma coming into Canada is down to one per cent of what it was. Why?

Yet, when I approached a number of people of influence in our community to help the Pusumas, a Roma family who were hiding in a church, most of them dismissed the need. They weakly argued in favour of Harper's refugee policies, having no real understanding of its nuances. Why?

I know full well in my blood that Israel is paramount to the security of the Jewish People. I would die for Israel. Yet I ask, when will we begin caring once again about the needs of the "stranger," the most vulnerable among us, like the Roma, who are simply not welcome in our country anymore?

Do we live and die for Jewish nationalism at the expense of all other Jewish obligations?

If you feel so inclined, now would be a good time to write a letter, send an email or make a phone call to your MP and Immigration Minister Chris Alexander, asking them to bring the Pusumas back, now that their story has been proven true.

Chag Samayach. Freedom is not just for us. Happy Pesach.■

Canada failed the Pusuma family

Bernie Farber

When governments make policy errors, it can have a detrimental impact on society. Thankfully, policy can be changed. However, when policy affects a family's life, it can have a devastating effect.

Last year, I wrote about the Pusuma family. The Pusumas came to Canada as refugee claimants from Hungary. They are of Roma and Jewish origin. Because they're human rights activists, they were targeted and harassed based both on their ethnicity and their human rights work. They and their then-one-year-old-daughter were brutally attacked by Hungarian neo-Nazis.

At any other time, Canada would have welcomed them as refugees fleeing persecution. But under the present government, they were labelled phony refugees, taken advantage of by an unscrupulous refugee lawyer whose carelessness led to a rejection by the Immigration and Refugee Board. The same recklessness in legal appeals also led to failure. As a last resort, the Pusumas went into sanctuary in a Toronto church basement.

As the months turned to years, the Pusumas became disillusioned. Lack of freedom and forced sanctuary can do that to you. Despite entreaties to government officials, including the minister of immigration, there was no mercy. Our once-proud record of Canadian compassion for those less fortunate has been turned on its head. At one time, a case like this would have elicited understanding and, in all likelihood, a temporary visa to remain in the country, pending the resolution of allegations of professional misconduct against their lawyer, Victor Hohots. But the Harper government would not bend, so the Pusumas left Canada and returned to Hungary, where they remain in hiding.

On March 2, Hohots admitted to allegations of misconduct before a disciplinary panel of the Law Society of Upper Canada. There were 13 complainants, all Roma refugees (including the Pusuma family), all of whom charged that it was his misconduct that led to findings of inadmissibility. Sadly, almost all 13 claimants have been deported.

This is not just a story of legal misconduct. For Canadians, it's a story of government cruelty and mercilessness.

Throughout this entire ordeal, instead of giving any credence to the fact that 13 refugee claimants may have had honourable cases against Hohots, the government chose to demonize them. Referring to them as "bogus," ministers of the Crown appeared more like bullies than heroes and consistently refused to even consider the merits of their cases.

In the end, as reported in the Toronto Star, Hohots admitted everything, from not providing adequate legal advice to writing inaccurate and incomplete claims. He acknowledged doing little of the needed work, pawning it off on an interpreter in his office and an immigration consultant.

Regarding the Pusuma family specifically, the Star noted that a letter of reference from Victoria Mohacsi a one-time prominent Roma member of the European Parliament, was not submitted by Hohots to the immigration tribunal. As well, Hohots admitted that a documentary film giving substance to the Pusumas' claim was neither translated nor brought before the tribunal.

Hohots also agreed he had no notes of any substance pertaining to the few meetings he had with the Pusuma family. He robbed the Pusumas of any further legal recourse.

Much of this information was known to the government, yet it still refused to show compassion.

Many Canadians supported the family. Churches, synagogues and 43,000 Canadians signed a petition asking for sympathy – all ignored by the Harper government. And most sad in my view was the unconscionable silence from mainstream leaders in our own Jewish community.

It's too late for the Pusumas, whose lives have been irreversibly shattered. It's not too late, however, to take back our dignity and compassion. As we approach a federal election, please go to the website of the Jewish Refugee Action Network and ask all federal candidates to sign the pledge of change toward refugee compassion. It's a start to reclaiming our Canada. ■

Who speaks for the Jewish People?

Rabbi Dow Marmur

Last month, before the elections in Israel and at the time of the intense debate about Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's speech to the U.S. Congress about Iran, one of his arguments for going to Washington was that he doesn't just represent the State of Israel but the entire Jewish People.

He said this was also his reason for attending the demonstration in Paris in the wake of the attacks on the satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo and the kosher supermarket Hyper Cacher, even though the president of France asked him to stay away.

Netanyahu's claim raises a number of questions both within Israel and beyond. For example, his claim to speak for the Jewish People may provide another reason for Israel's Arab citizens – some 20 per cent of the population – to regard the statement as further evidence that their country's prime minister doesn't represent them.

The claim also became problematic when many American Jewish leaders urged him not to come. The left-leaning advocacy group JStreet even canvassed Jews in the United States to sign lists stating that Netanyahu doesn't speak for them. U.S. Senator Dianne Feinstein, who's Jewish, described Netanyahu's statement as arrogant.

An editorial in the Forward, the leading American-Jewish weekly, speculated tongue in cheek that, as only 25 per cent of the six million Jews in Israel voted for Netanyahu and 70 per cent of the 5.3 million American Jews voted for Barack Obama, the president of the United States may have more reason to regard himself as speaking for the Jewish People.

So who does represent the Jewish People? Answer: no individual, however exalted her or his office, and no organization, however pretentious its title, can claim to speak for us all, or even for most of us.

Judaism has no pope, which means that no rabbi can speak for all Jews or even for all religious Jews. The Israeli chief rabbinate has made claims to represent authentic Judaism, but even the majority of Orthodox Jews has justifiably ignored it.

Sephardim and Ashkenazim in Israel have different chief rabbis. Some have been less than role models. For example, the previous Ashkenazi chief rabbi Yona Metzger is currently under police investigation for massive misappropriation of funds and related offences while he was in office.

Despite its exalted self-definition, the World Jewish Congress is basically in the hands of one philanthropist who got it from another philanthropist. Though it makes occasional representations to governments, nobody believes that it actually speaks for the Jewish People.

Even locally, representation of the entire Jewish community eludes those who claim it. Two previous British chief rabbis have been peers of the realm with seats in the House of Lords, but despite their reputation outside the community, they didn't represent even its Orthodox sector, to which they belonged.

Though the lay equivalent, the Board of Deputies of British Jews, has a distinguished history, its role seems also to have been overshadowed in recent years.

The former Canadian Jewish Congress, perhaps modelled on the Board of Deputies, came close to a version of democratic representation, but it has now been dismantled by philanthropists who claim to have Jewish interests at heart but appear to have no patience with the democratic ambitions of their less affluent sisters and brothers.

We're a pluralistic community. Neither savvy politicians nor successful philanthropists and their staff can represent us. As the Forward editorial put it, "We've learned to find vitality and sustenance in a dynamic pluralism that resists centralization."

The same article also provides the most cogent answer to Netanyahu's claim: "We have survived into modern times because we haven't relied on one leader – a king or prelate or pope – and instead embraced the fact that we are diverse in more ways than we can count."

Or as Daniel Gordis of Jerusalem's Shalem College, writing in the Jerusalem Post, put it: "No one has ever spoken for all Jews, and it is hard to imagine anyone ever will." ■

Support should not be defined along partisan lines

Anthony Housefather and Michael Levitt

Jewish communities across the world recently celebrated the Purim holiday. The story of how political action saved the Jews of Persia, reminds us that it is essential for our community to have a voice in the political process.

In Canada, we recognize the importance of electing Jewish community members at federal, provincial, and municipal levels as well as electing those who understand the issues of importance to us. We must be a full partner of government and democracy, which means having advocates in all political parties.

The Jewish community is best served when support for community issues, including Israel, are not defined along partisan lines. The rise of the extremist Israeli Apartheid Week events on university campuses and the vitriol of the BDS (boycott,divestment and sanctions) movement has been of immense concern to our community in recent years. Just recently, on March 15, the politics of intolerance and division were on full display in presentations, demonstrations, and a BDS resolution at the McGill Student General Assembly. Similar spectacles of intolerance were planned for Toronto campuses during this week's Israeli Apartheid Week.

The BDS movement attacks the free exchange of ideas that is at the heart of our university system. Labeling Israel an apartheid state moves beyond reasonable criticism of Israeli government policies and into the demonization of all Zionists. It creates an atmosphere of hostility and intimidation for Jewish and pro-Israel students on campus.

In the face of this threat, the community reacted in a truly Canadian way – bringing together a wide range of groups and leaders – some Jewish and some not – to say that "Enough is Enough!" Elected officials from all levels of government and of all partisan stripes stood together with McGill students in opposition to this latest BDS assault.

And then, a couple days before the McGill resolution, one more voice was heard through Twitter, rallying McGill students in opposition to the March 15 vote. That voice belonged to Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, like us, a McGill alumnus. His message was clear; "The BDS movement, like Israeli Apartheid Week, has no place on Canadian campuses. As a @McGillU alum, I'm disappointed. #EnoughIsEnough."

As federal Liberal candidates in the next election, we have been very proud of the clear and unequivocal stand taken by Trudeau and the Liberal party on this issue.

In a speech to students at the University of British Columbia earlier this month, Trudeau clearly stated that neither Israeli Apartheid Week nor the BDS movement have a place on Canadian campuses. We echo and share that commitment and we will work hard to ensure that Canadian campuses are not overrun with the shameful politics of intolerance and division.

Recently, Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler launched a debate on anti-Semitism in the House of Commons. It culminated with unanimous support from members of all parties voting in favour of a well-drafted resolution on the issue. The fact that we currently have a Parliament where all three major political parties are prepared to take such a stand is something that we as Canadian Jews should be proud of, and something worth working to retain.

We now need to continue to work together at other campuses across Canada. Israeli Apartheid Week in Toronto takes place this week, and so the hard work must continue to ensure our Jewish students feel as safe and valued on campus as we did 20 years ago. On this issue and many others of great importance to our community, we are strongest when we stand together, not as partisans but as Canadians. ■

Canadians weigh in on Israeli election results

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Whether it was unexpected, as his naysayers suggested, or breathtaking as his supporters maintained, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the Likud Party scored a huge win in last week's Israeli election, taking 30 seats in the 120-seat Knesset and maintaining the upper hand in forming a new government.

The Zionist Camp, the centre-left opposition led by Isaac Herzog and Tzipi Livni, which pollsters had assured were in a dead heat with Likud, or even ahead, finished second with 24 seats.

In Canada, Prime Minister Stephen Harper congratulated Netanyahu "on his election results. We look [forward] to working with the government once formed. Israel has no greater friend than [Canada]," he stated on Twitter.

The New Democratic Party's foreign affairs critic, Paul Dewar, said in a statement that the party would "be watching as a coalition government emerges."

The NDP "remain[s] steadfast in our commitment to a negotiated two-state solution where Israelis and Palestinians can live in peace and security, side-by-side with negotiated and agreed-upon borders.

"We will continue to urge the government to press this position with whoever forms the government in Israel," he stated.

The Liberal party had not commented on the election as of The CJN's press time.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), the community's largest advocacy organization, noted that those who ran for public office showed Israel is "a vibrant, healthy democracy.

"Israelis are clearly engaged and passionate about the choices facing the country, as exemplified by the fact that this year's election drew the highest voter turnout in nearly two decades and was a close race to the very end. In particular, the success of the Joint Arab List – which ranked third in seat count – is an unmistakable example of the openness of Israeli democracy as is the fact that more women have been elected to the Knesset than ever before," said CIJA chair David Cape.

Avi Benlolo, a dual Canadian-Israeli citizen, voted in the election during a visit to Israel. While there, he said, he spoke to many Israelis who were unsure of how they'd vote. He said he, too, was uncertain whether to vote primarily on security concerns or issues related to social welfare.

Commenting on behalf of the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, which he heads, Benlolo said, "The strength of Israel's democracy can be seen by the 34 political parties that fielded candidates in the election, including a newly formed Joint Arab List party... that finished third overall. It was a real privilege to participate in such a vigorous, albeit singular democracy in the Middle East."

Netanyahu's opponents on the left wing of the political spectrum said his victory was tainted by campaign rhetoric they called bigoted and by his rejection of a two-state solution. They said Likud's victory will likely lead to isolation of the Jewish state.

Arie Raif, a former Israeli diplomat and a Herzog supporter, said "I am concerned because of the fact that Mr. Netanyahu considers Arab Israeli citizens a fifth column. He called to make sure Israelis come to vote because, God forbid, Israeli Arabs gain power."

Benjamin Netanyahu and wife Sara celebrate on election night. RONI SCHUTZER/ISRAEL SUN

As for Netanyahu's campaign statement against a Palestinian state, Raif said, "Now we know the true colours of Mr. Netanyahu. We know he never meant a separation from the West Bank or a Palestinian state."

Karen Mock, a spokesperson for JSpace Canada, a "Jewish, progressive, pro-Israel, pro-peace voice in Canada," said the organization was disappointed in the election result "and especially the way Netanyahu resorted to last-minute fear-mongering and not-so-veiled racism. It reminded me of [former Quebec premier Jacques] Parizeau's comments [after the 1995 sovereignty referendum]how upset he was with the ethnic vote, and it worked for him. It rallied far right voters. [Netanyahu's] fear-mongering about Israeli Arabs voting in large numbers is just totally unacceptable."

Netanyahu's rejection of a Palestinian state "is a step backward and not in Israel's best interests. We're fearful it will fuel the [boycott, divestment and sanctions] movement," she added

Responding to criticism of Netanyahu's two-state remarks, Israeli Ambassador to Canada, Rafael Barak, advised people to take the statement "with a grain of salt," the Ottawa Citizen reported.

"What my prime minister said is related more to the fact that we don't have a credible interlocutor to date that [can] come to a compromise," Barak told a briefing organized by the Pearson Centre for Progressive Policy.

Netanyahu went into "TV mode" in the last days of the campaign, the ambassador added, suggesting the comments were simply electioneering.

Speaking on Fox News in the United States, Netanyahu said his comments about the Arab vote "should be taken in a larger context.

"I warned of foreign money coming in to selectively try to bring out supporters of a list that includes Islamists and other factions that oppose the State of Israel," he said.

As to his comments apparently backtracking on a two-state solution, he said "the conditions for that, today, are not achievable."

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' rejection of a Jewish state, his alliance with the Gaza-based Hamas organization, and the volatility in the region have changed "the terms" for an agreement, Netanyahu told Megyn Kelly, host of The Kelly File on Fox. ■

Police find Jews most targeted group for hate crimes

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

With the release of the Toronto Police Service's annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report, members of the Jewish community might well ask themselves, is the glass half full or half empty?

The 2014 report found that hate crimes reported to police went up by 11 per cent over 2013 and that Jews were the single most targeted group in Toronto, followed by blacks and members of the lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and queer (LGBTQ) community. The total number of occurrences affecting all groups was 146 – in a city of 2.7 million people.

Nevertheless, Jews seemed to be singled out. Though comprising only 3.8 per cent of the city's population, Jews were the victims of racist attacks 44 times, or in fully 30 per cent of occurrences. Add in four attacks on Israelis, who were categorized as a separate victim group, and 33 per cent of victims were likely Jews, though Israeli victims could in theory include Christians, Muslims or Druze.

LGBTQs were the victims in 27 occurrences, followed by blacks in 20 cases. Next came Muslims, who were victimized 16 times. Single incidents were recorded in the cases of people from Korean, Chinese, Pakistani and Catholic backgrounds.

Other categories included "white" and "brown" and an additional 14 "multibias" occurrences were recorded, in which Jews again featured prominently, and in some cases, somewhat unusually.

In addition to the 44 incidents involving Jews, additional single incidents involved "Jewish/LGBTQ/Muslim," "Jewish/LGBTQ/Black," "Jewish/Somali," "Jewish/Muslim," "Jewish/Black," "Jewish/Jehovah's Witness," and "Jewish/LGBTQ/Canadians/Americans/British."

These brought up the total involving Jews combined with another identity to 52 – not including the four Israeli victims.

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said the findings should be seen in context.

"The report speaks to a fundamental truth. Canada is a great country to live in and Toronto is a great city to live in. But the fact hate crimes occur in Toronto should be of concern to everybody. The fact the numbers are up is a concern. The fact that Jews were the most targeted is a concern," he said.

> We have to pay attention to these things, but we can't let them define us.

"We have to pay attention to these things, but we can't let them define us. There's more to being a Jew in Toronto than being the victim of hate crimes.

"I think if we remember that every incident represents a school, a synagogue or an individual that has been told they did not belong, and even if it happens once, it is significant and it is worth noting," he added.

The three most common offences reported to police included "mischief to property, assault and criminal harassment. The Jewish community and the black community were the most victimized group for mischief to property occurrences, while the LGBTQ community was the most victimized group for assault occurrences," the report stated.

Altogether, 22 people were arrested in connection with hate-motivated crimes. Since most incidents involved property offences, such as graffiti and vandalism where there are no witnesses, investigating the events has proven a challenge, the report stated.

The report also noted that the findings might "not be a true reflection of the prevalence of hate/bias crimes occurring in Toronto," since they are likely being under-reported to police.

Of the 44 incidents involving Jews as the victim group, 38 involved mischief, including three that involved a religious property, two were assaults, one was described as criminal harassment and three incidents involved death threats.

The Israeli victims faced two cases of wilful promotion of hatred and one each of mischief and being threatened with death.

The largest number of incidents involving Jews took place in 32 Division, which runs from Steeles Avenue in the north to Lawrence Avenue in the south and from Bayview Avenue in the east to the CNR tracks to the west of Dufferin Street. ■

Turkey holding more Shoah memorials, professor notes

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Prof. Umut Uzer of Istanbul Technical University

Turkey's recent wave of Holocaust commemorations warrants more attention and analysis – both in the academic research community and the Israeli media, says a professor at Istanbul Technical University.

Umut Uzer, a professor of humanities and social sciences, said that in the past several years, Turkey has shown unprecedented initiative in holding public ceremonies to commemorate the events of the Holocaust.

Uzer, whose research includes the Middle East peace process, the Arab-Israeli conflict and Turkish-Israel relations was speaking in a lecture on March 16 at the University of Toronto's Near and Middle Eastern civilizations department.

Since 2011, for instance, Turkey has held official commemorations for International Holocaust Remembrance Day (IHRD), which have been attended by Turkish foreign ministry officials, diplomats and, in one instance, the governor of Istanbul.

This trend toward publicly marking the Holocaust is surprising, Uzer said, given that Turkey is becoming increasingly conservative and its relations with Israel are becoming more tense.

"What is Turkey's interest in the Holocaust," he asked, "especially as the country gets more Islamic and there's a rise in anti-Semitic writings, especially at Islamic newspapers, or on television?"

He went on to offer potential reasons for the trend: it could be a kind of "public relations" effort, he said, or it could be that Turkey is paying homage to the Holocaust to positively impact bilateral relations with Israel, though it's unlikely that this will be especially effective.

"I think the two countries have disappointed each other," he said, referring to the 2010 Mavi Marmara incident, in which nine activists from a Turkish ship attempting to break Israel's blockade of Gaza were killed by members of the Israeli navy.

Israel and Turkey currently only have "low-level diplomacy between them," he said, and "outstanding relations must first be addressed." It could also be that authorities want to assure Turkish Jews their rights are protected.

Whatever the reason, Uzer stressed the commemorations will likely have a positive effect on Turkey's ability to obtain membership in the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance, where it's now an observer, and may serve to counter anti-Semitism and discrimination in the country.

"The Islamist press may have attacked these commemoration events more if the big heads of government hadn't gone to them," Uzer said. "So, in that sense, the Holocaust commemoration could have some effects in tamping down the radical Islamist media outlets."

One prominent memorial event on IHRD was held at Istanbul's Neve Shalom Synagogue. Last year, Uzer said, this event was held at a private university in Ankara and was attended by around 400 people, including the speaker of parliament – the "second-highest person in the country after the president" – the foreign minister, who delivered a speech, and a number of generals and diplomats both Turkish and foreign.

Uzer noted, however, that the foreign minister's speech was not particularly well-received in Israel, given that he criticized the government of Israel.

"It caused disappointment," Uzer said. "The Israeli foreign minister said it was inappropriate to [criticize Israel] on this day… but I'd say the fact it was held at all, and attended by the speaker of the parliament, is a big deal."

In addition, Uzer said that Yad Vashem recently offered online training to a number of Turkish academics on the subjects of Holocaust and Jewish life in Eastern Europe, and that the course culminated in an in-person seminar at Yad Vashem.

"Many of these academics have since incorporated this new knowledge into their subjects and curricula," he said.

Finally, this year Turkey held its first official commemoration of the 1942 Struma Disaster, in which nearly 800 Jewish refugees aboard the MV Struma were killed in an attempt to escape from Romania to Palestine, the Struma had temporarily stopped in Istanbul, but Turkish authorities towed it into the Black Sea, where it was torpedoed by Soviet forces.

Uzer said that at the commemoration, the minister of culture gave a speech that was "really well-received by the Jewish community" and "he stressed the Struma commemoration will be held every year."

He acknowledged that the Israeli public and media have many other issues occupying their attention, but asserted, "As far as I can see, there isn't enough interest in the Israeli media about this stuff." ■

Tilly Oslender can't explain how she's lived to 108

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Throughout Tilly Oslender's 108 years on this planet, she's worked hard and experienced innumerable joys and hardships, but throughout it all, she's always maintained a positive attitude, a thirst for knowledge and a sharp sense of humour.

"A son goes away to university… he calls his mother and says, 'Ma, I got married,'" Ukrainian-born Tilly begins, sitting in the dining room of her midtown apartment in Toronto, pulling a joke out of her mental Rolodex.

"She says, 'You got married?! What's the rush?' He said, 'I had to do it… she's pregnant… she already has five kids, but we have nowhere to live.' [The mother says,] 'OK come here.' He says, 'Where are you going to live?' She says, 'Oh, I'll drop dead.'"

Tilly, who celebrated her birthday on March 24, sat down for an interview with The CJN alongside her only daughter, Roslyn Oslender.

Despite having been approached by reporters in the past, her interview with The CJN was the first she has agreed to do.

She said she made a decision not to talk about her age after attending a program at a retirement home 36 years ago.

"They were saying their ages… I told them, at that time, I was 72. [They said], 'You don't look it, you must be making a mistake.' They thought it was not true," Tilly said.

On her way home, she fell and broke her wrist. "I became superstitious and chose not to talk about my age."

But Tilly, whose birthday predates the discovery of penicillin by 20 years, is living proof you're never too old to change.

Over the decades, she has needed to be flexible and adaptable. She and her oldest sister were brought to Canada from her native Ukraine by relatives in Toronto when she was 22 to escape the hardships brought on by the Russian Revolution.

She said Jews were oppressed and "everyone was trying to run away."

Tilly, who was one of five siblings, worked tirelessly – at one point making $3 a week at a garment factory in Toronto – to save enough money to sponsor the rest of her family to join her here.

But she said after she paid an immigration agency to bring them over, "they closed the immigration and that was the end of it. They couldn't come."

In the decades since Tilly has been living in Toronto, she only visited them in Ukraine once, about 15 years ago.

"Fifty years had passed since they had seen each other," Roslyn said.

"They have all passed away," Tilly added. "I'm the only one left."

Tilly, who was married for more than 55 years to her husband, Jack, who died in 1990 after a long battle with emphysema, said she worked hard all her life, but balanced that with an active social life.

In 2004, Tilly and her daughter joined Beth Tzedec Congregation, where she attends weekly bridge games, various programs and High Holiday services.

"My mom has a terrific attitude and always wants to know what's coming up, what she can look forward to… She's very positive, not a complainer, and she enjoys life and wants to know everything," Roslyn said.

"She's telling the truth!" Tilly jumped in.

"My doctor asks me, 'How did you do it?' I don't know. I have no idea… I said, 'You're the doctor, you should tell me!' I made him laugh," said Tilly, who still lives alone, although a nurse comes daily to help bathe her, and her daughter, an only child who doesn't have any children of her own, is her mother's closest companion.

"She calls me about a dozen times a day," Tilly said.

"She's the only one. She is one in a million, and she doesn't know what she does for me. She prolongs my life."

"Stop it, Mom," Roslyn interjected. "It's not true. I always say it's only God. If I'm an instrument, that's great, because I love my mom, but I don't prolong anyone's life. But it's nice that she says that."

Although last year Roslyn threw a big party for her mother's 107th birthday, plans were more laid back this year, likely a lunch date with friends and family.

"Every year on our birthdays, we go to the synagogue, always… thanking God," Roslyn said. ■

Israeli university students give back to community

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Despite Hillel of Greater Toronto's offering of on-campus programs for Jewish university students in Toronto, many Israeli students appreciate having a space of their own to socialize, develop leadership skills and contribute to the community.

"There is a bit of a cultural difference. [The Israeli students] like to speak Hebrew amongst themselves, to have a place to be as Israeli as they want and hang out with people from similar backgrounds," explained Rotem Stark, Hillel of Greater Toronto's director of Israeli initiatives and the leader of Pisga, a leadership program launched by Hillel four years ago and targeted at Israelis studying at colleges and universities across the city.

Earlier this month, this year's cohort of 25 Pisga participants – the largest group Pisga has had to date – engaged in a series of charitable activities as a way to give back to the local Jewish community.

On March 8, the students put on a Purim carnival for youth at the DANI Centre, a nonprofit agency that helps develop and nurture independence for young adults living with physical or cognitive challenges.

The event included face painting, mask making and the assembly of mishloach manot.

And on March 12 and 13, the students assembled 20 Shabbat baskets full of gourmet goodies and snacks, and delivered them to people in the hospital, in partnership with Chai Lifeline Canada, a nonprofit that helps families that have a child suffering from a serious illness, and Bikur Cholim, a social service organization that provides support to vulnerable individuals and families.

"The idea was to complement the food staples people get [from organizations like Bikur Cholim] with chocolates and other yummy things that everyone loves to get, as well as foods you can easily consume in the hospital, like packaged couscous," Stark said.

Pisga's overall aim is to provide Israeli students with a forum for socializing and obtaining professional development skills, and the group includes people who recently moved from Israel to study in Canada and some who are Israeli-born but have lived in Canada for a number of years.

Toronto Pisga participants make masks at the Purim carnival they put on for youths at the DANI Centre.

Participants range from first-year to fourth-year students and come from a range of schools, including York University, the University of Toronto, Ryerson University, George Brown College and Seneca College.

Stark, who herself moved to Canada from Israel at age nine but returned as a teenager to serve in the Israel Defence Forces, noted that, particularly for those who are very new to Canada, the transition to life here can be tough.

"I think they can struggle to fit in with the Canadian Jewish community and may need that adjustment period to get used to the culture," she said, citing the fact that "Canadians are much more polite [than Israelis]" as an example.

Much of Pisga's programming is conducted in Hebrew, and activities also include team-building sessions, speaker events, mentorship around professional skills, and social opportunities such as ski trips.

Stark emphasized that Pisga members are not isolated from other Hillel participants, and are frequently encouraged to attend general Hillel gatherings and parties in addition to the Pisga programming.

"Israeli students can have some challenges when they first move here, and I think they appreciate having this group around to help soften that in-between state," she said. ■

Halifax Hillel delivers soup to sick students

LEAH COLLINS LIPSETT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Elyse Holmes, a Dalhousie University student living in residence, receives much-needed chicken soup from Arielle Branitsky, director of Jewish Student Life for the Atlantic Region of Hillel Canada, as part of Atlantic Hillel's "chicken soup hotline" program for sick students.

Spring might be hitting the rest of Canada, but in Halifax, snow banks still line the streets, temperatures remain below zero – and colds are still rampant.

Atlantic Hillel in Halifax knows that when students are sick, it can take all their energy just to get out of bed, let alone make themselves comfort food.

That's why Hillel created a "chicken soup hotline."

"It's Jewish penicillin," says Tamar Ellis, student body president of Atlantic Hillel. She's the one who cooks the soup, from scratch – "I don't like soup mixes," Ellis says. The soup is all kosher: mostly chicken, with a vegetable option for vegetarians.

It's kept frozen at Hillel House, the organization's homey centre near Dalhousie University and delivered directly to sick students' doors within 24 hours of an email request.

"A lot of students that come to Dal come from out of town, so it's a nice way to make them feel a little at home," says Ellis.

The program started in the 2013-14 school year when Hillel held a big Shabbat dinner and had a lot of soup left over afterward. Atlantic Hillel hosts weekly Shabbat dinners, as well as events such as film screenings and talks.

"We were freezing it, and the previous Hillel director thought it would be a good idea to give it out to sick students," says Ellis.

By the end of the term, all the soup was gone. So Arielle Branitsky, director of Jewish student life for the Atlantic Region of Hillel Canada, decided to continue the program this school year.

"Right now, we're only set up for a really small demand," says Branitsky, who delivers the soup when Ellis isn't able to. So far this school year, they've only had a handful of requests, but Branitsky wants to expand the hotline.

"What I'd like to see is just making sure more students know it's available to them," she says.

This winter the hotline was only publicized through the Hillel email newsletter, which reaches about 370 people, some of whom aren't students any more. When there's room in the Hillel budget, though, Branitsky wants to print magnets with the chicken soup hotline information and give them out on campus.

"And then, ideally, every fridge is sitting there with a reminder that they can call Hillel for some chicken soup."

Branitsky is modelling the program after a similar hotline at Western University in London, Ont. The idea of a "Jewish penicillin hotline" was first conceived by the University of Michigan Hillel and caught on across the United States.

"It's not only beneficial to the students, but it's a good reminder to the parents that we're here, and that we're doing good things for their kids. As a non-profit organization, you need your community to know you're working for them," Branitsky says.

"I had a student [who had received soup] come up to me last term and say, 'I have to give you a hug on behalf of my mother.'

"It's so Jewish in nature," Branitsky says, laughing.

Halifax has the biggest concentration of Jewish students in the Maritimes, but that still isn't very many – only around 300, Branitsky estimates.

"We're doing this as a service for the student community, and we recognize that in this area, there isn't a huge Jewish population," she says.

Regardless of the number of students using it, Hillel and its programming are still important, Ellis says.

"It's nice for Jewish students to have something that they can identify with... meeting other Jewish people, and educating non-Jewish students on campus about what we do."

Elyse Holmes, a Dalhousie student living in residence, experienced the chicken soup hotline first hand when she had a bad cold earlier this winter. She was all smiles – and stuffed nose – when Branitsky delivered her soup.

"I was feeling really crappy, and when you're feeling that way, you definitely don't want to go out and find your own soup," Holmes said. "So it's nice to have it delivered and have it homemade."

Sick students in Halifax can email halifax.hillel@gmail.com to request soup, or to get involved with Hillel. ■

Israeli delegates face 'die-in'

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Tensions flared between pro-Israel and anti-Israel students at McMaster University earlier this month after students protested a visit by a delegation of four Israelis who were promoting their country's diversity.

On March 12, four Israelis who are part of a project called Connecting Leaders in Communities (CLIC), established to promote Israel's shared values with other democratic countries and build partnerships, were brought to McMaster by a pro-Israel student group called Israel on Campus (IOC), with the support of McMaster Hillel.

McMaster Hillel president Lindsay Stitt said that when the four Israelis – a Palestinian-Muslim-Israeli, Areen Haj Ahmad; a half-Christian, half-Jew, Hanna Larson; and two Jewish-Israelis, Sam Sank and Yona Melchers – set up a table in the student centre to let students ask them questions, one of them was "mistreated" by students who opposed their message.

"Areen, the Palestinian-Israeli girl… had requested that she wanted to be represented by a Palestinian flag and asked if we could put that up. We said 'No problem.' I printed out a Palestinian flag and an Israeli flag, and we put them up," Stitt explained.

"I was present for a conversation where Areen was told she should not have the flag at the table because she does not represent the oppressed Palestinian voices. When Areen said she works very hard in Israel for the rights of Palestinians who are not in Israel, she was told she should not have the flag up. She was spoken to in a very rude manner," Stitt added."

"At the tabling event, she was being mistreated, being told that she didn't understand the issues, told that her flag doesn't represent her."

Raphael Szajnfarber, director of McMaster Hillel, said IOC and Hillel had planned an event for later that evening called Business Partners in Peace.

"It was to include a member of the delegation who is a Palestinian Arab Israeli [Ahmad] who would be speaking alongside a McMaster University professor, both of whom have experience using business as a tool to foster positive conversations and dialogue and co-existence," he said.

He said Ahmad chose not to take part in the evening lecture because she felt too intimidated after the tabling session.

"She had received a lot of Facebook messages and she had been surrounded, and she told me personally, 'I don't feel comfortable speaking, I'm sorry,'" he said.

"She was called a traitor and was being bullied, and she ended up deactivating her Facebook account to stop the messages from coming in," Stitt added.

In the hours following the tabling event, anti-Israel students began putting up posters around campus that contained an image pulled from CLIC delegate Sam Sank's blog that showed him holding two flare guns in his Israel Defence Forces fatigues.

The posters contained a caption that said, "Not on our campus."

The following day, about 75 students gathered in McMaster's atrium, not far from the student centre, to hold a "die-in."

"From the second floor of the atrium, there were paper planes that were dropped, and they were hitting people, and they were falling down as the paper airplanes hit them," Szajnfarber said.

Although no campus group took credit for the protest or the posters of Sank, which were posted without authorization from the university, Szajnfarber suspects Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) McMaster, a student group involved with the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel, was behind it. "No group took responsibility, but all of the leaders of SPHR organized it and spoke at the protest," he said.

SPHR didn't respond to an interview request, but a post on its Facebook page referred to the tabling event and posted the photo of Sank that was used in the poster.

"We are sorry that Israel on Campus felt it was appropriate to have these people leafleting in the student center… People like this don't have a place on our campus. Our campus should never be a place of violence," the SPHR Facebook posting said.

On March 23, a resolution urging the university to cut ties with Israeli institutions was scheduled to be tabled at the McMaster Student Union general assembly.

Szajnfarber wouldn't reveal how Jewish and pro-Israel groups were going to respond to the vote, but said BDS "creates a really toxic campus environment and BDS… is a discriminatory movement." ■

Winnipeg Jewish Theatre welcomes new artistic director

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Ari Weinberg vividly recalls his first experience in the theatre 21 years ago, when the then nine-year-old was cast in a production of Fiddler on the Roof at Toronto's Leah Posluns Theatre.

"I have been in love with the theatre ever since," he said.

Weinberg subsequently attended a high school for the performing arts in Toronto, and then Sheridan College. While his early postgraduate work in theatre was on stage, he found himself drawn more to working behind the scenes. His goal was to become an artistic director, a goal the 30-year-old has finally realized in his new role with the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT) as its new leader. And he couldn't be happier.

The 27-year-old theatre company has just come through a traumatic time. In February 2014, faced with declining audiences and declining revenues, its board made the difficult decision to fire artistic director Michael Nathanson and cancel the remainder of the season.

Last fall, Kayla Gordon, Nathanson's predecessor, agreed to act as interim artistic director. She noted in an earlier interview that the WJT's precarious financial situation was not unusual. "Every couple of years, the board would say that we lacked the funds to stage a second or third show," said Gordon, who was the WJT's artistic director for 11 years. "But we always found a way to survive.

"It happens with other Jewish theatres as well. Such is life in small theatre with small audiences."

In December, the theatre mounted a one-man show, Jake Ehrenreich's A Jew Grows in Brooklyn. The three performance sold out.

For Weinberg, who officially starts in his new position June 1, this will not be his first time in Winnipeg. Four years ago, he was cast in a Manitoba Theatre Centre production of Romeo and Juliet, which was set in Jerusalem.

"One day in rehearsal, Steven Schipper [MTC's longtime artistic director] asked me what I saw as my future in the theatre," Weinberg recounted. "I told him that I wanted his job.

"Steven took me out for lunch and outlined the responsibilities of an artistic director. In 2013, he invited me back for a month as an intern artistic director. He became my mentor."

Ari Weinberg

Most recently, Weinberg served as intern artistic director at the Toronto-based Metcalf Foundation and was the internship adviser for the music theatre performance program at Sheridan College. He also directed productions of Godspell and Sweeney Todd at Theatre Sheridan. He has two Patron's Pick awards from the Toronto Fringe Festival.

Weinberg said he kept in touch with Schipper, who encouraged him to apply for the WJT opening.

"I am excited to be coming back to Winnipeg," he said. "I love the city. I have had terrific experiences in my previous visits. And there is such a vibrant artistic arts and culture scene. I am looking forward to attending the theatre, the ballet and the opera. In Toronto, I would go all the time."

The WJT's next production is Bad Jews, which makes its Canadian premiere May 6. Weinberg will be on hand for the opening.

He said he and Kayla Gordon will be working together to plan the next season.

"I want to stage shows that will appeal to people of all ages," he said. "In particular, I want to reach out to younger audiences. I want our shows to feel like events that people will want to come to."

He is also looking forward to having his parents and both his bubbies and zaides come from Toronto to see his openings. ■

Torontonian throws party for girl affected by terror

Philanthropist pays to bring Danish teen and her family to Israel after her bat mitzvah was interrupted by Copenhagen attack

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Hannah Bentow cuts her cake and dances at her bat mitzvah at Jerusalem's Matan Women's Institute for Torah Studies.

A Danish mother whose family was sent to Jerusalem by a Toronto philanthropist to reprise her daughter's bat mitzvah after the original party was disrupted by a Feb. 14 shooting attack outside a Copenhagen synagogue said the experience has strengthened her sense of Jewishness.

"It reinforces my Yiddishkeit," Mette Bentow told The CJN after the family of five had returned from a week-long, all-expenses-paid trip to Israel that 33-year-old Torontonian Josh Salmon, a total stranger to them, took upon himself to arrange.

Last month, Salmon read in The Times of Israel about 12-year-old Hannah Bentow's sense of remorse after Dan Uzan, the man standing guard outside the Copenhagen synagogue where her bat mitzvah was taking place, was shot to death by a lone, allegedly Islamist gunman.

"I read that she wished she'd never had a bat mitzvah," Salmon said, "and I felt really bad that a kid had to feel like that... And I thought, what better place for a girl to have her bat mitzvah than Israel?"

Salmon, who owns a high-end landscape design and construction company, got in touch with the chief rabbi of Copenhagen, who connected him to the Bentows.

"I called Mette and said, 'I'd like to send you guys to Israel, what do you think about it?'" Salmon said.

Bentow – who felt Hannah's sense of guilt around her bat mitzvah was "a burden that's unfair for a 12-year-old to have to carry" – was "gob-smacked by Salmon's offer," she said.

"Philanthropy is not a thing we're so used to in Denmark, because we pay so much tax," she added. "So for someone to offer such a grand gesture, we couldn't believe it."

Although initially hesitant because she believed any money spent should go to Uzan's family or his memorial fund, Bentow said Salmon assured her, "We'll do both," so the Bentows accepted.

Salmon's friend, the owner of the Israeli Dan Hotels chain, paid for them to stay half the week at the Dan Eilat Hotel and the other half at the Dan Jerusalem Hotel.

Salmon arranged for Hannah's bat mitzvah to be held at the Matan Women's Institute for Torah Studies in Jerusalem and connected them with an Israeli party planner, who supplied a DJ, sweet table and photo booth.

The Matan Institute's chancellor invited her granddaughter and her friends – all around the same age as Hannah – to attend the party.

"The party was really nice, and it was so sweet of the girls who came," Hannah said. "I almost felt like a superstar with all the attention and amazing things we got to do... I don't even know how to thank Josh – he is the nicest person ever! I mean, who does something like this for someone they don't know?"

Hannah's mother reflected: "It was so fantastic, like retribution. These terrorists think they can make us less Jewish or hide who we are, but we just took more pride in it."

She said the trip gave her family "the break we needed" after the trauma of the Copenhagen shooting, during which they and their guests had to hide in the synagogue basement for several hours.

"I think the one who coped best was actually Hannah, and our youngest, who's eight, probably took it the hardest. In the weeks after, he was afraid to go out in public or to school because he said he was sure someone would recognize him as a Jew and 'kill me.'"

All three children attend a Jewish school in Copenhagen, which Bentow said is protected by barbed wire and a police presence.

Salmon, who was unable to attend the Jerusalem bat mitzvah, said he made the gesture because "I felt we couldn't undo what's been done, but we could try to give Hannah a second chance."

In addition to the party, he arranged for the Danish ambassador to Israel to take the Bentows out to lunch one afternoon, as well as for them to spend time volunteering on an army base and meeting soldiers, and for them to visit a dolphin observatory in Eilat, which has a program for children who have undergone terror attacks or sexual abuse.

Salmon said he's passionate about supporting organizations that assist individuals with special needs and has contributed to charities such as Dani, Yachad and Chai Lifeline.

"I've never met Josh," Mette Bentow said, "and I don't know what I'm going to do when I actually meet him...We are beyond grateful for what he and all the others did for us." ■

Hillel cancels controversial aboriginal Zionist's talk

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Hillel Montreal is defending as a "principled stance" its last-minute decision to cancel a talk by assertive pro-Israel activist Ryan Bellerose of Calgary, which had been scheduled to take place March 16 at Concordia University.

Bellerose, who is also an activist for aboriginal rights, thinks the event was scrapped because some Israel advocacy groups, including the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and "progressive Zionist" students, do not like his "in your face" approach to defending Israel.

"I'm not a very PC guy," said Bellerose, who did receive a platform to speak two days later at a private event organized by the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR).

Hillel contends the reason was that Bellerose's recent tweets, mostly to Hamas' Twitter account, and his response to those tweets on other social media, were not acceptable discourse.

Bellerose is a founder of Calgary United With Israel, which describes itself an independent grassroots group, largely composed of students, that was started a couple of years ago. During the war in Gaza last summer, it was involved in a rally for Israel outside Calgary City Hall that turned violent. A similar group, Toronto-based StandWithUs Canada, sponsored Bellerose's trip to Israel last year.

Bellerose, 40, a burly semi-professional football player and former oil-rig worker who grew up in the Métis settlement of Paddle Prairie in northern Alberta, was to have spoken on "How Being Indigenous to Canada Helps Me Understand the Middle East" at a widely publicized afternoon event sponsored by Hillel Concordia and Hillel McGill. He said he was told by Hillel late the night before it would not be taking place.

Hillel Montreal executive director Jeff Bicher told The CJN that the "decision to cancel... came as a result of information received from students that many would consider mainstream pro-Israel activists.

"Hillel's policy is to promote civil discourse, and we felt that his [Bellerose's] discourse did not remain civil. I have read Mr. Bellerose's tweets and, although some were written in tasteless humour, we were prepared to still have him share his experiences on campus. What led to this point was the way in which he chose to respond on the event Facebook page. Mr. Bellerose crossed the line in many students' eyes, and ours."

On March 15, Bellerose retweeted a photo to #AskHamas of two young boys apparently choking as they are hung by the collars of their T-shirts to a railing by a man, with the caption: "Do you put children out to dry??"

Among a series of tweets by Bellerose to #AskHamas the day before were: "What do you plan to do about the lack of women in Gaza, buy more goats or buy more sheep?" and "How much it cost [sic] to convert your terror tunnels into sewers, after all they are filled with sewage anyway?"

In announcing the event's cancellation, Hillel posted on Facebook: "Although much of what Ryan Bellerose espouses with respect to indigenous people and Israel resonates with our community, some of his messages are clearly not in line with Hillel or Concordia... It is unfortunate that at this late stage we are forced to cancel the event, but Hillel Concordia cannot ignore some of Mr. Bellerose's previous public comments that only came to our attention in the last few hours."

After the cancellation, a post appeared on Bellerose's Facebook page from "an admin" that he or she "believe[s] this was a case of character defamation."

"If Hillel Montreal/Concordia really valued different 'races and cultures' as they state... they would value Native straightforward talk, which isn't necessarily pillowed with flowers around the edges. Racist move in this admin's opinion."

Bicher denied allegations by some students and by Bellerose that left-wing Jewish students or CIJA, the advocacy partner of Federation CJA, which funds Hillel, pressured Hillel to pull the plug.

Bicher said many of the pro-Israel students who rallied to defeat the BDS motion put forward at the Students' Society of McGill University general assembly March 15 "were the same students who took issue with Mr. Bellerose's behaviour. I am happy to note that their barometer was right on...

"We recognize that some may take issue with this principled stance. We are comforted though by the plethora of messages from pro-Israel activists, on campus and around the world, commending Hillel Montreal, Hillel McGill and Hillel Concordia, for doing what was right."

CIJA did not respond to an emailed question from The CJN on the matter.

Bellerose's appearance was scheduled during the annual Israeli Apartheid Week at Concordia and McGill University. Among its events was a discussion at the Native Friendship Centre of Montreal on "Indigenous Resistance to Colonialism and Racism" which included Glen Coulthard, a member of Yellowknife's Dene First Nation, and another featuring local Métis artist Moe Clark.

In his March 18 talk at CIJR, Bellerose avoided the issue until it was raised by the audience. He said he was angry and feels he was "smeared a little bit."

His message to CIJR was that natives and Jews are both indigenous peoples fighting for their ancestral land and both face insurmountable prejudice from "white people."

Jews are the indigenous people of the Land of Israel, he said. "Jews should not apologize for winning," he said, and other indigenous peoples see them as an example of how to successfully return to their land. "It's important to celebrate that victory."

Bellerose is a contributor to a recent CIJR online publication titled Zionism, An Indigenous Struggle: Aboriginal Americans and the Jewish State. The article, co-authored with American Comanche activist David Yeagley, contends other movements have tried to appropriate the oppression of Native Americans into their cause. ■

Cotler looks back on his (small) role in Israel-Egypt peace

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Most people are spectators to history, others are active participants. A select few end up having a cameo role.

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler has been a prominent player on the international scene for decades, defending prisoners of conscience and freedom fighters such as Nelson Mandela and Natan Sharansky, among many.

But in one of the 20th century's most momentous events – the peace talks that led to the treaty between Israel and Egypt – Cotler had a smaller, albeit important, role.

It was, he said, something of a cameo appearance.

The year was 1977, and Cotler was a young law professor who'd studied at Harvard and was teaching at McGill University. After the school year ended, Cotler took a path less travelled, spending his summers in Egypt, Syria and Jordan, lecturing at local universities and studying the domestic political culture, foreign policy and attitudes of the people. He'd end his summers with a trip to Israel.

By 1977, he'd already visited the region a couple of times, the first in 1975 as part of a delegation of professors for peace in the Middle East.

During that trip, he made the acquaintance of a number of personalities who would go on to enjoy prominence on the international stage. One was Tahseen Bashir, a confidant of Egyptian presidents, including Anwar Sadat, who had been a liaison with the visiting professors.

In 1976, Cotler addressed the Institute of Political and Strategic Studies at al-Ahram Institute, where he met Boutros Boutros-Ghali, a professor at Cairo University who would go on to serve as Egypt's foreign minister and later as secretary general of the United Nations.

> I was asked to bring a message from Sadat to Begin exploring the possibility of a peace process.

Those personal connections led the law professor, who himself would later achieve some prominence as Canada's minister of justice and attorney general, to an important crossroads of history.

Bashir and Boutros-Ghali knew Cotler, knew he was a supporter of the State of Israel, and knew he ended his summer trips with a visit to the Jewish state. With the election in 1977 of Menachem Begin as prime minister of Israel, they wanted to know what Cotler thought about the new right-wing Israeli leader.

Here's how Cotler remembers it: "There were two questions they were interested in: did I believe Egypt could make peace with the newly elected Likud government of Israel?" Cotler recalled. "My answer was yes, I believed that Likud, if they would agree to a peace process, would be able to carry the country.

"Then came the major question… Did I believe that Sadat could make peace with Menachem Begin? I said, look, I don't know Menachem Begin personally. I said he's known to me as a great parliamentarian, a believer in democracy, somebody I believed would want to make peace with the largest and most important of the Arab countries, with Egypt, and yes I believe he would be open to an Egyptian-Israeli peace process."

It was, apparently, what the Egyptians wanted to hear. Cotler was called back for subsequent meetings, during which he met Sadat, the Egyptian president.

"I was then asked to bring a message from Sadat to Begin exploring the possibility of a peace process. And Sadat was very clear what the conditions for an Israel-Egyptian peace were," Cotler said.

"One was complete withdrawal by Israel from the Sinai Peninsula. Number 2 was recognition of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people."

Then came the big question: would Cotler be willing to convey to the prime minister a letter from the Egyptian president outlining his terms for negotiations and to bring back his response?

Cotler wasn't sure if Begin would agree to the conditions expressed by the Egyptian president, but he agreed to transmit the letter directly to the Israeli leader.

From Egypt, he continued to his previously scheduled meeting in Syria, but cut it short and cancelled a visit to Jordan. Back in Israel, he was not yet sure how he could gain entrée into Begin's circle. It came about somewhat fortuitously, though by then Cotler had established numerous connections among movers and shakers in the Israeli establishment.

After addressing a lunch event for young parliamentarians, a young woman present, who happened to be the parliamentary secretary for Likud, wanted to know more.

Her name was Ariela Zeevi, and she was someone "I did not know at the time," Cotler said.

Zeevi had heard Cotler speak about the Jews of Syria, including the high regard they had for the newly installed prime minister. Intrigued by his information from Damascus, she told him he must tell his story to Begin directly.

She arranged the meeting, and a day or two later, Cotler found himself with Zeevi, sitting in Begin's office, meeting the prime minister for the second time – he had crossed paths with Begin in 1967 when the Likud leader visited Montreal, but he was sure Begin would not remember him. Cotler updated him about the situation in Syria and then added, perhaps ominously, that there was something he had to discuss in the strictest of confidence, with no one else present in the room.

Other camp accepts non-Jewish teen rejected by Solelim

jshupac@thecjn.ca

The father of a 13-year-old Richmond Hill boy who was refused entrance to Camp Solelim because the teen isn't Jewish said another Jewish camp has offered to accept his son.

Andrew Weir said he spoke to one of the directors of Camp Wingate, a new private camp on the site of the old Pripstein's Camp Mishmar that serves kids ages seven to 16 and is located just north of Montreal, and was told by her that his son Tyler and any of his friends who wished to join would be welcome at the camp.

Director Laurie Wiseman explained that the Jewish-owned Wingate is primarily attended by Jewish campers, and camp rituals include reciting blessings before meals and singing Hatikvah, but there is no policy on admitting children based on religion.

"I've actually never heard of such a thing in my life," she said, adding that she was "shocked" to read about Weir's situation in news reports.

"Tyler won't go to a camp unless his friends go with him... so we're thinking about trying to make a movement [to encourage Solelim kids to join Tyler at another camp]," Weir said.

"I hate that I'm causing all this junk, but I have to think to myself, 'Do I let them get away with this? Do I actually want to bring kids away from their camp?'"

The story of Tyler's refusal by Camp Solelim, despite the fact he attended one of Solelim's feeder camps, Camp Shalom, last summer, was picked up by several news outlets after Weir contacted a Richmond Hill-based Metroland reporter earlier this month about Tyler's case.

Weir said it hadn't been his intention to "put the Jewish People in the spotlight like this" and stressed that his beef is with Solelim, not the Jewish community at large. He added that he was initially reluctant to go to the media, but said a Jewish friend of his encouraged him to do so.

"I didn't expect it to go this far," said Weir, who has raised Tyler as a single father since birth. "I just promised I'd do everything I could to help my son go to camp with his friends."

Tyler goes to school with many Jewish kids, he said, and a large proportion of his friends are Jewish.

Camp Solelim is located near Sudbury and serves 14- and 15-year-olds. It's part of the non-profit Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ) movement, which has seven affiliated camps across Canada, including Shalom. The cost of Solelim's six-week program is around $7,000.

Weir said that the phone call he had last fall with Risa Epstein, national executive director of CYJ and director of Solelim, in which she informed him that Tyler would not be allowed to attend camp, made him "sick to my stomach," and that she was "incredibly rude."

"She told me I shouldn't even be calling and was ignorant of the fact that Tyler shouldn't be going to a Jewish camp."

Speaking to The CJN, Epstein denied saying those things, but would not offer further comment on her discussions with Weir.

Solelim spokesperson Sindi Kachuck told The CJN the camp has not heard from any parents who say they'll pull their kids out to join Tyler at another camp, and that Solelim has only received one email from a camp family that said Tyler should be admitted.

She said a Solelim board member spoke to Weir about the camp's mission as a "place for Jewish children to explore their Jewish identity" and that Weir expressed disappointment, not anger.

Tyler, who spent three summers at Camp Walden, a Jewish-owned for-profit camp with many Jewish campers, prior to attending Shalom last year, said, "At Shalom, I got to make a lot of new friends... I feel really upset and not welcome anymore."

Adam Shulman, director of Shalom, told The CJN that Weir had been approved at Camp Shalom as the result of an oversight.

"The official policy at Camp Shalom is we look for campers who have at least one parent who is Jewish, and on the application, we ask if the mother and father [respectively] are Jewish," Shulman said.

He explained that although Weir's application indicated that he's not Jewish and doesn't have a parent who is Jewish, this was only caught by the camp after the boy was officially accepted.

"It was only after his approval that we realized [he isn't Jewish]," he said, noting the camp did not want to rescind Weir's approval at that point. He added that even within the Young Judaea system, each camp has its own individual policy on the issue of admitting campers based on Jewish identity or parentage.

Weir said, however, that he had, at the time of applying to Camp Shalom, explicitly told the camp on the phone that Tyler wasn't Jewish and asked if that would be a problem. He said he was told there was no issue with it.

Epstein told yorkregion.com that the camp must adhere to its mission to develop future leaders of the Jewish community by nurturing Jewish identity and values and fostering a sense of pride in Israel.

"This mission statement is foremost in our summer training and educational programming," Epstein said. "For this mission to be accomplished, it is essential that our campers be Jewish."

On March 17, Epstein sent an email to parents from Camp Solelim's board of directors saying the article that appeared on yorkregion.com news was "one-sided and many statements in the article attributed to camp director Risa Epstein were untrue."

It added: "We differ from other camps as our primary focus is... to offer a unique, positive, immersive Jewish experience for 14-15 year olds... This value of developing one's own culture is also recognized in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Faith-based schools, camps and other organizations are protected under the Human Rights Code. These rights and freedoms are fundamental to the success of our democratic Canadian society."

Kachuk said that since the email was sent out, the response from Solelim families has mostly supported the camp's decision.

Weir said he's not sure if he would at this point be willing to send Tyler to Solelim, assuming the camp reversed its decision, though Tyler says he still wants to go.

Weir, who said he and Tyler aren't religious, noted, "I even asked Tyler at one point if he wanted to convert. But he said, 'I'm like you, Dad. I don't want to practice it, but I enjoy learning about this stuff.' He's not willing to commit to anything at this point, but he loves learning about Judaism and thinks the history behind Judaism is amazing."

Simon Wolle, acting director of Camp Northland-B'nai Brith, said Northland's application doesn't ask if campers are Jewish and non-Jews have attended over the years.

"If we become aware that a potential camper applying to camp is not Jewish, we would likely contact the parents to make them aware that the majority of campers and staff are Jewish and part of the camp's mission statement is Jewish identity-building... to ensure that the parents and potential camper are... making an informed decision." ■

Should Jewish camps accept non-Jewish kids?

Opening up the summer experience in the spirit of multiculturalism can yield surprisingly positive results

Mira Sucharov

Before Camp Solelim, the Young Judea camp that has made headlines for turning away a prospective camper because he's not Jewish, makes its final decision, I suggest they talk to Aaron Ingram.

A Winnipeg-based real estate and corporate commercial lawyer, Aaron is by all accounts a leader in the Jewish community. He sits on the board of directors of Camp Massad of Manitoba as well as the Shalom Residences; he is a member of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community relations committee; he is a Jewish Federation donor; and, as he describes it, is "a longtime supporter of the Jewish community and the State of Israel."

Did I mention that Aaron is not Jewish?

Let's back up to when Aaron was a chubby-cheeked, blonde five year old in 1989. That summer, he accompanied his mom who had taken a job as the head cook at Camp Massad in Winnipeg Beach, the Hebrew immersion camp that I also attended. Fast forward 18 years, and Aaron had logged 10 years as a camper and eight summers as a counsellor, including two as assistant director. (His mom, Marilyn, is still head cook.)

A very agreeable kid with a big personality, as a youngster, Aaron quickly landed leads in the camp plays. With no formal Hebrew background, his lines were transliterated for him. Soon enough, he acquired the services of a Hebrew tutor during the school year. By the time Grade 5 rolled around, he was enrolled in one of Winnipeg's half-day-Hebrew-immersion schools. In grades 7 and 8, he attended Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the Jewish high school, where he earned a spot in the highest Hebrew level. He recalls being able to finally read the camp play scripts in Hebrew letters as a "big moment" for him.

"As a child growing up in the disadvantaged North End of Winnipeg," Aaron told me in an e-mail interview, "my experiences in the Winnipeg Jewish community, being immersed in the wonderful environment that is Camp Massad, a world of creativity and intelligence, and the lifelong friendships that I have developed… have heavily influenced me."

I asked Aaron whether he feels Jewish. Not religiously, he tells me. He is an atheist. (That there are Jewish atheists is admittedly a bit of complexity we didn't get into.) But he considers himself culturally Jewish, and certainly a part of the Jewish community.

"I have cried tears of despair in the death camps in Poland," he tells me, "and have cried tears of joy upon my arrival in Israel."

And were he to meet and marry a Jewish woman who wanted him to convert, he says he would do so "without hesitation."

Aaron recalls his early experiences with daily and Shabbat prayers at Massad. "When I was a young camper, participating in the daily prayers and Shabbat tfillah, it felt like being handed the keys to a secret world that was welcoming me. I loved singing the prayers. I still know most, if not all, by heart."

For his part, Aaron thinks Solelim's decision to bar access to Tyler Weir is seriously misguided. As a board member at Camp Massad, he personally extends Tyler an invitation to join the Camp Massad community and offers to personally fundraise to offset the cost of airfare from Toronto to Winnipeg.

It's clear that there's a value clash between the particularist and insular dimensions of Jewish programming, and especially Jewish camp – fuelled, no doubt, by the fear of intermarriage. On one hand is the need to inculcate culturally rich and rigorous experiences in our youth. On the other is the desire to fit in with Canadian multicultural values of openness and pluralism. Even there, though, multiculturalism relies on robust transmission of cultural identity, something that can most easily be achieved in a culturally homogeneous context, some would argue.

Yet people like Aaron – and I join him in this sentiment – would claim that opening the windows a crack to those who might have their own reasons for wanting to partake of our rich communal traditions may yield unexpected benefits not only for them, but also for the communities of which they may seek to be a part. ■

Mira Sucharov is a an associate professor of political science at Carleton University.

Camp equips Jewish youth with the essential leadership skills that will benefit the larger Jewish community

Risa Epstein

A Jewish camp designed specifically for Jewish campers: who would have thought that, in 2015, the very idea of such a camp would spark any discussion?

Certainly not the founders of Camp Solelim, who established it 50 years ago to provide Jewish teenagers aged 14 and 15 with a summer experience that would instil pride in their Jewish heritage and in Israel – the Jewish State that, back then, was only a teenager itself.

In our Canadian multicultural society, we have always had, among other things, Catholic school boards, profession-based associations, faith-based clubs, girls-only organizations such as the Girl Guides, and many boys-only schools.

At Camp Solelim, it has always been about equipping our Jewish youth from across Canada with leadership skills that will benefit the larger Jewish community from coast to coast.

Over the years, thousands of campers have "roughed it" in Solelim's tents on Clearwater Lake, outside of Sudbury, Ont. Recently, many former campers have written to tell me how much being a camper at Solelim meant to them and what a huge impact it had on their lives – and, more specifically, on their lives as Jews.

As Solelim's camp director for 13 years, I have personally witnessed the positive effects that this camp has on these Jewish kids. By the end of each summer, they are charged up – excited – about being Jews and Zionists. There is a certain Jewish spirit – "ruach" – that follows Solelim campers when they return home and remains with them for the rest of their lives. It's that spirit that has prompted many former campers to send their own children to the camp – because they wanted their own kids to have the Solelim experience and feel the camp's inimitable "ruach" as well.

Our legacy affirms that the Solelim experience not only impacts our campers as they mature into adults – many of whom take their place as Canadian Jewish leaders – but that they pass that legacy down into the next generation of Jewish children. This is a heritage we continue to nurture.

That is why we are so disappointed to see Camp Solelim in the spotlight, not because of our achievements, but because of a decision we made based on our guiding principles that have served us well for 50 years and inform everything we do. At our core are programs that provide Jewish teens with the opportunity to learn about, question, examine and explore their Judaism, with a view to developing their own Jewish identity.

Guided by the Jewish tenet of tikkun olam, we appreciate and embrace outreach to other faith communities and contribute to the Canadian society at large. We have programs that support and raise awareness for numerous causes in the wider community, such as Pencils for Kids in Africa, the Sudbury Food Bank, and the Christmas toy drive. We pride ourselves on our ability to build and sustain relationships with other faiths and people of non-Jewish backgrounds.

Based on our 50-year mandate, the direction we took with this specific application was appropriate. We discussed our position with the family and we understand the child's disappointment. We are sympathetic to his situation, but there are many options for him in the Jewish family of camps. Some have reached out to the family directly.

In such a diverse Jewish community, there is room for different kinds of Jewish camps, and the mandates and policies of each should be respected. These diverse models must continue to coexist, as our laws provide.

I am proud of what Camp Solelim has achieved and look forward to the positive impact it will continue to have on Jewish children in the years ahead. ■

Bibi's last minute warning that the left might win spiked the Likud turnout

HAVIV RHETTIG GUR
JERUSALEM

A lot of groups are licking their wounds after Likud's trouncing of the Labor-led Zionist Union on March 17.

The Israeli left, to be sure, did better than it has done in almost a generation. It rallied around the Labor party, energized the base, sent thousands of volunteers to "get out the vote."

And it lost. Spectacularly.

In the process, politicians, pundits, pollsters and analysts learned some important lessons – not just in humility, but also in the changing face of the Israeli electorate.

The right learned that Likud is its great indispensable party, the big tent to which it rallies in times of danger. That ethos of underlying unity among the usually bickering factions of the right headed off the left's most potent challenge in almost two decades. It won't be forgotten anytime soon.

We all learned that the right knows how to get out the vote. Or, at least, that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu does. His method was simple: talk incessantly about the turnout of the enemy – the left, the Arabs, the shadowy foreign funding behind it all. It wasn't exactly a noble or honest final few days in Likud's campaign, but it worked.

Overall turnout spiked in this election, and the smart money held that this rise would favour the left. It was leftists, after all, who have been missing from previous elections. But in the wake of Likud's stunning surge in the final count, a surge predicted by no poll and no pollster, the simple fact is inescapable: right-wingers came out to vote, right-wingers who haven't bothered to vote in recent elections, right-wingers who did not like or support Netanyahu – all felt compelled to save Israel from the prospect of a left-wing victory. In the last two hours of voting, a two-point turnout jump over 2013 swelled to a five-point spike. That rush, it's now fair to say, was of right-wing voters delivering the first "election surprise" of the right.

Why did turnout rise so dramatically? Simple: the majority of the Israeli electorate continues to distrust the left's judgment. It is a trust deficit rooted in a more general distrust of Palestinian intentions, of the Obama White House and other touchstones of left-wing policy. In hindsight, it may be one of the bitter ironies of this campaign that Labor's own slogan, "It's us or him," may have done as much to guarantee Netanyahu victory as anything Netanyahu may have done.

And that brings us to what the left can learn from this race. The despair emanating from left-wing voters and pundits is misplaced. The left did better in this election than it has done in a long time. But the left has spent almost two decades essentially writing off the electorate as too trapped in fear or hate to be worth seriously campaigning for. That, at least, has been the explanation of left-wing media outlets such as Ha'aretz over the years for Netanyahu's continued triumphs at the ballot box. The path to reclaiming an electorate one has ridiculed and despised for so long is a hard one. But, alas, the left will not actually lead Israel without the support of a majority of Israelis. Isaac Herzog is the first leader of the left in quite a few years who seems to understand that.

Botched TV exit polls earn vote of no confidence

RENEE GHERT-ZAND
JERUSALEM

Having heard the results of the exit polls on election day March 17, Israelis went to bed thinking that the Likud and Zionist Union were neck and neck. Two TV exit polls (on Channels 1 and 10) showed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud and Isaac Herzog's Zionist Union, the country's two largest parties, tied at 27 Knesset seats each. The third (on Channel 2) showed the Likud leading the Zionist Union by one seat, 28-27.

Either way it was close, and though Netanyahu was clearly better placed to form a government, the leaders of both parties were said to already be reaching out to smaller parties in bids to form ruling coalitions.

It was a whole other story, however, when citizens awoke the next day to learn that with 99 per cent of the ballots counted, the Likud had actually won 30 seats and the Zionist Union only 24. Herzog, who had promised hope and change, conceded defeat and Netanyahu was on his way to forming a right-wing government and another premiership.

Zionist Union campaign strategists were not the only ones being asked what had gone wrong. Questions were being raised as to how the exit polls – announced with great fanfare and little hint of potential fallibility – could have been so far off in predicting the actual six-seat spread between Likud and Zionist Union.

The pollsters offered answers, but it seemed they themselves weren't completely sure what had happened.

Prof. Camil Fuchs, a Tel Aviv University statistics expert who conducted the Channel 10 exit poll, told Army Radio that the discrepancy could be attributed to the fact that a larger number of voters refused to participate in his exit poll than in past elections.

TALKING ABOUT ISRAEL

THE NEED FOR A NEW CONVERSATION

Instead of uniting us, Israel often divides us. How do we develop a new way of talking about Israel, and what should be the boundaries of this conversation?

Join Donniel Hartman for a dialogue on the need to create a framework that opens the discussion for those of us invested in Israel's success to also fight for the Israel we want.

OPINION

We may argue, but we all want to see Israel thrive

Joseph Schwartz

> Anyone can come to Israel for a visit, pray at the Kotel, enjoy a shwarma but only Israeli citizens can cast their ballots and help determine their country's fate

If you have friends or family in Israel, then it's pretty likely your Facebook feed was filled last week with pictures (or selfies) of people casting their votes in the 20th Israeli election.

There's a reason people, myself included, felt the need to post a picture – something I've never seen done in a Canadian election – and it's because voting in Israel is an amazing experience.

Anyone can come to Israel for a visit, pray at the Kotel, enjoy a shwarma, or ride a camel, but only Israeli citizens can cast their ballots and help determine their country's fate. It's not only a privilege, it's a responsibility, and one I try not to take lightly.

Having made aliyah in October 2012, this was actually my second time voting in Israeli national elections. Still, this year's election felt just as significant and important as the last time I voted. (I have even started my own tradition of eating a new fruit before voting in order to make a Shehechiyanu prayer on the special day. This year I opted for a guava; last time it was papaya.)

But despite the jubilation of voting, election season in Israel can be extremely divisive, especially in this campaign where both sides had nearly identical rhetoric. Likud's campaign posters proclaimed "It's us or them," while the Zionist Union opted for "It's us or him."

Basically, it was someone against someone else.

Also, in Israel, unlike Canada, it is quite accepted and common for people to ask each other who they voted for. This can cause further divisions – consider that in the final election results, 12 parties received at least one per cent of the vote, meaning the odds that two people voted for the same party were not great.

Yet, somehow, you could still feel a sense of unity. Since Election Day is one of the few national holidays that isn't Shabbat or a religious holiday, it's considered to be like a Sunday, a day off that can be enjoyed outdoors, on the beach, or by having a BBQ (which we of course called a Bibi-Q).

In that regard, Election Day in Israel is similar to Yom Ha'atzmaut, and I spent part of the day at the beach with a small group of friends. Among us, there were voters for five different parties, and of course we knew whom each person voted for. Last election, I played baseball with a group of Americans who also represented voters of at least four parties.

The day after Election Day, I happened to be in a small falafel shop in Jerusalem. In front of me, waiting in line like the rest of us, was Zionist Union MK Hilik Bar. He seemed engrossed in conversation on his phone, and he took his falafel to go (so I didn't have time for a selfie). Still, seeing him there reminded me how small Israel really is, and how much the lives of all Israelis are interconnected. We may have different views, but at the end of the day we all want what's best for our country.

I will end with a story. A couple of weeks ago, my roommates and I needed some painting done in our apartment. Our landlord hired a painter who showed up about an hour early with no tools. After having to leave to get tools and a ladder, he asked me if he could borrow a pair of pants because he didn't want to get his pair dirty.

That's one of my favourite things about this country. We all argue for weeks about pretty much everything, but then we borrow each other's pants. Because, in all honesty, we have no other country, and at the end of the day we all want to see it thrive and succeed. ■

Israeli Arabs call on Netanyahu to apologize for turnout comments

ELHANAN MILLER
JERUSALEM

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's warning on election day of high Arab turnout at voting stations continued to make waves, as civil society groups and private citizens accused the Likud leader of inciting against a fifth of Israel's population.

"Next time a [political] murder takes place, it will be as though the prime minister sanctioned it by saying it's OK to hate Arabs," said Arab-Israeli TV presenter Lucy Aharish, who was chosen to light a torch in the coming Independence Day ceremonies, on Channel 2's Meet the Press. "The prime minister simply doesn't get it."

Arab voter turnout reached 64 per cent last week, significantly higher than the 57 per cent rate of the 2013 elections, though still much lower than Israel's national average of 71.8 per cent, which was a 15-year record.

MK Ahmad Tibi, number 4 on the Joint (Arab) List, turned to the camera during a Channel 2 interview on March 19, asking Netanyahu to publicly apologize for his comments.

"You have hurt all Israeli citizens, not just the Arabs," Tibi said.

Members of the Joint List met with President Reuven Rivlin on Sunday and told him that they had turned to Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein and requested that he recommend that Netanyahu stand trial for his statements.

Although Netanyahu subsequently explained that his comments were not intended to single out Israel's Arab population but rather to warn against foreign meddling in the election process, the Abraham Fund Initiatives, an Israeli non-profit dealing with Jewish-Arab co-existence, asked Rivlin to take Netanyahu's words into account when tasking him with forming the next government.

The prime minister's comments, the organization told Rivlin on Sunday, "have deeply shocked Arab society in Israel, causing huge damage to the Arab minority's relations with the state."

"We regard with seriousness the encouragement of fear and hatred toward Arab citizens of Israel as part of the election campaign, ignoring the long-term damage that these utterances cause to the common life of Jews and Arab citizens of Israel," the statement read.

"We call on you (Rivlin) to raise this matter during your consultations, and ask the prime minister to rectify the damage caused to Arab-government relations through a corrective public statement."

Indeed, during his meeting with party representatives on Sunday, the president denounced "hateful" remarks during the election campaign, calling on Israeli politicians to "mend and heal Israeli society."

Speaking with Joint List Leader Aymen Odeh, Rivlin spoke out against the "harsh and hurtful" remarks by both Jewish and Arab candidates during the election season. In the run-up to the elections, a Joint List spokesperson compared Zionists to the Islamic State. "There is no place for such remarks, not during the elections and certainly not after them," he said. "I call on everyone, Jews and Arabs alike, to refrain from mutual incitement and provocation."

U.S. President Barack Obama was among several world leaders who criticized Netanyahu for his remarks, expressing concern about the impact of that sort of rhetoric on Israeli democracy.

"We indicated that that kind of rhetoric was contrary to what is the best of Israel's traditions. That although Israel was founded based on the historic Jewish homeland and the need to have a Jewish homeland, Israeli democracy has been premised on everybody in the country being treated equally and fairly," Obama told the Huffington Post.

"And I think that that is what's best about Israeli democracy. If that is lost, then I think that not only does it give ammunition to folks who don't believe in a Jewish state, but it also I think starts to erode the name of democracy in the country," he added.

Meretz MK Issawi Freij also called on Rivlin to compel Netanyahu to apologize for his remarks.

"Netanyahu was not averse from using racism, with words whose aim was to stir up the basic fear of the voters in order to snatch a victory at the polling station, but this victory achieved on the backs of Israel's Arab citizens," Freij said. He called on Rivlin to demand that Netanyahu apologize to Israeli Arabs publicly, "and to make that a condition to receiving the mandate for putting together the government." ■

Will the left use this loss as a catalyst for future win?

One of the more long-term questions that arise from this race is whether the left will be able to use this loss as a catalyst for future victory. If, as has been its wont, the left falls back on its traditional rhetoric depicting Netanyahu's Israel as wracked by famine, poverty and war, and facing imminent collapse, then it will be setting itself up for continued failure. Such talk is hard to take seriously when battling an election; it would be truly dangerous to take it seriously after losing one.

The left now needs to build on its success, find new constituencies, develop a "ground game" not just in the two months before an election but in the three years that separate them. Despair will not get it from where it is now to where it needs to be to win.

Finally, the world's professional Israel watchers, journalists, pundits, think-tank analysts, should (but probably won't) learn an important lesson from this race about Israelis. A recurring theme on the Twitter accounts of foreign correspondents – at least of the overwhelming majority whose opinion of Netanyahu is not favourable – is that Netanyahu won the election through "fear-mongering."

It is true that Netanyahu explicitly "fear-mongered," and that this won him his steep lead last week. But Netanyahu's international critics fundamentally misunderstand his audience, his electorate, and so deeply misconstrue what exactly he was "fear-mongering" about.

Netanyahu's critics insist that he fear-mongered about Iran and the Palestinians. He did not – because he doesn't have to. The Israeli electorate has long ago written off Palestinian politicians as untrustworthy and unable to deliver peace. And it is Iran, not Netanyahu, that has convinced nearly all Israelis from all parts of the political spectrum that Iran is a very real danger to Israel.

All Netanyahu had to do was to warn, at times in blatantly racist terms, that the left and Arab voters were "turning out in droves." His fear-mongering was not on the substance of the disagreement with the left – the electorate already mistrusts the left's judgment on these issues – but simply to warn that the left might win. That alone spiked the Likud vote, even in the cold late-evening hours of election day.

The election turned from a near-rout of the right predicted in poll after poll by the entire panoply of Israeli pollsters into one of the right's most dramatic victories in decades. The lessons abound: shifting turnout meant that geography didn't quite play its expected role, settlers switched en masse to Likud even as they disappeared as a pressure group in Likud's primaries, and the V15 "anyone but Bibi" campaign probably ended up mobilizing more rightists than leftists on election day.

But the main lesson is also the most obvious one. The left did better this election than it has in a long time. Yet it only really took its first step on the long road to rehabilitation and victory. ■

Right-wing voters tend to participate less in exit polls

Mina Tzemach, who conducted Channel 2's exit poll together with her partner Mano Geva, insisted her statistical model was good. She also pointed to lower than usual participation in her exit poll as the possible problem.

"Usually we have seven or eight per cent of voters who don't agree to participate, but this time is was more like 15 per cent," she told Army Radio.

Tzemach said this lack of participation was greatest at polling places that were known to have many pro-Likud voters, and in particular immigrants from the former Soviet Union countries who are reluctant to take part in exit polls. This under-representation of Likud voters must have skewed the results, she said.

Channel 1 pollster Stella Karayov dismissed a suggestion that exit poll participants could have been untruthful about whom they had actually voted for. According to her, this kind of behaviour would have affected results for not only the large parties, but also the smaller ones – whose exit poll numbers turned out to be very close to actual vote counts.

Channels 1 and 2 used similar methods in their exit polls. Both asked voters who had just finished dropping their actual ballots into official ballot boxes to vote again in similar fashion for the exit poll.

Channel 2 set up 60 ballot boxes at polling stations around the country to gather information from 25,000 voters this way. The polling stations were chosen based on socio-economic criteria, as well as on information gleaned from the two previous elections as to the reliability of exit polling at these particular locations. Channel 1 used the same number of ballot boxes, but at polling places that served a total of 30,000 voters.

Instead of using ballot boxes, Channel 10 asked people to fill out a survey after voting. Fuchs told Ha'aretz that he suspected that the lower participation rate that this approach generates (usually around 80 per cent) is due to the lack of anonymity. At the same time, however, he said the methodology was preferably in terms of speed and logistical simplicity.

Prof. Tamar Hermann, academic director of the Israel Democracy Institute's Guttman Center for Surveys, does not give much credence to exit polls, no matter how they are conducted, she told the Times of Israel. She prefers to look at the information that long-term surveys provide.

In a report she wrote for the Peace Index survey just a week before election day, Hermann predicted that the right bloc would win based on a lack of change in public attitudes in the months since the elections were called late in 2014.

Echoing comments by the television pollsters, Hermann said that certain subsections are indeed harder to survey. She confirmed that right-wing voters do tend to participate less in exit polls, as they consider them to be associated with what they perceive as a left-leaning media.

In other types of polls and surveys, she said other groups, such as young people, are harder to reach because methodologies such as calling people at home on telephone landlines are becoming less useful and reliable in the digital age.

The real problem with exit polls may not lie with how voters act as they are surveyed as they exit the polling stations, but instead with how they behave at home after they have voted.

"It's a problem of impatience and greed," Hermann said of the inaccuracy of exit polls.

There's the matter of the pollster's commercial interests, but also of the voters' desire to know the election results the minute the polling places close at 10 p.m.

"We act as though it would really hurt to wait 10 hours to get the results," Hermann said.

One Twitter user agreed, tweeting, "If the elections are over at 10 p.m. and we have final results at 6 a.m., then what do we need an exit poll for?"

Less patient Israelis (which would probably be the majority, if we were to do a poll) would rather keep the pressure on the polling professionals.

"If I had done a survey as I walked around on [Tel Aviv's] Gordon Beach, I'd still have come out with a more reliable poll," tweeted one. ■

Will the real Netanyahu please stand up

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu celebrates his victory last week. ISRAEL SUN PHOTO

URIEL HEILMAN
JTA, JERUSALEM

There are two Benjamin Netanyahus.

To his detractors, Netanyahu is arrogant, a dissembler and a racist. To his defenders, he is intrepid, politically astute and singularly devoted to Israel's security.

Netanyahu's critics blame him for alienating Israel's closest ally and hurting bipartisan support for Israel. They point to Netanyahu's statement last week that he opposes Palestinian statehood as proof that he, not the Palestinians, is responsible for the failure to reach a two-state peace deal. And when Netanyahu issued his plea on election day that Israeli patriots had better get out to counter the Arab-Israeli vote, they saw it as the ugly epitome of a campaign marked by fear-mongering and racism.

For these detractors Netanyahu is a symbol of everything that's wrong about Israel, and his strong win is a distressing sign of the direction Israel is taking.

"Benjamin Netanyahu's victory is a deep disappointment to all who hoped that Israel might choose a new direction for the country in yesterday's election," J Street's executive director, Jeremy Ben-Ami, wrote in an email last week to supporters of the self-described pro-Israel, pro-peace lobbying group.

"The manner in which the prime minister secured his victory – shredding the broad bi-partisanship that underpins American political support for Israel and preying on fear and racism at home – also demonstrated that he willingly put his own political interests before his concern for Israel's relationship with the United States and his commitment to Israel's democratic character."

To his defenders, Netanyahu is a very different figure, one who makes no apologies for putting Israel's security ahead of diplomatic expediency, is bold enough to deliver hard truths even when they are unpopular and is clever enough to outmaneuver political rivals – even the president of the United States. Yes, he has his flaws but the vicious attacks against him are little more than political mudslinging.

In this view, Netanyahu's decision to go ahead with his controversial March 3 speech to Congress had a positive effect. It galvanized opposition to a bad nuclear deal with Iran. Netanyahu may have upset some of Israel's friends, but the controversy served the greater purpose of helping focus attention on the deal's shortcomings.

When Netanyahu said that he wouldn't allow a Palestinian state on his watch, supporters saw it as an honest and sensible assessment of the lessons Israel has drawn from the upheaval that radical Islam has brought to the Arab world.

"I think anyone who is going to establish a Palestinian state and to evacuate territory is giving radical Islam a staging ground against the State of Israel," Netanyahu told the Israeli website NRG. "This is the reality that has been created here in recent years. Anyone who ignores it has his head in the sand."

He clarified his position (or backtracked, depending on your view) in an MSNBC interview on March 19 saying he supports "a sustainable, peaceful, two-state solution – but for that, circumstances have to change."

This view holds currency across the Israeli political spectrum, though left wingers might articulate it differently – perhaps stressing the desire for an eventual two-state solution and trying harder to figure out how to get there. After what happened with Gaza and Lebanon polls show few Israelis believe it's possible right now to cede West Bank territory without it becoming a staging ground for attacks.

Then there's the matter of Netanyahu's 11th-hour appeal to supporters to counter the Arab vote. Some defenders of the prime minister have downplayed it as campaign politics, noting that Netanyahu tried to soften his tone right after his election win, saying he would bring security and social welfare to "all citizens of Israel, Jews and non-Jews alike."

There's a lot of room between the polar opposite views of Netanyahu, and many Israelis occupy that space. That's key to understanding the election results.

Netanyahu wasn't the overwhelming favourite in Israel. His party captured only one-quarter of all votes. But Netanyahu was the beneficiary of several factors. Plenty of Israelis who don't like him or his leadership style still agree with the fundamentals of his positions on Palestinian statehood, Iran and the threat of radical Islam.

Netanyahu's chief rival, Isaac Herzog of Labor running under the Zionist Union banner, lacked the security credentials that helped elect the only other two Labor party prime ministers since 1977 – Yitzhak Rabin and Ehud Barak, both former Israeli Defence Forces chiefs of staff (Shimon Peres of Labor also served as prime minister but never scored an outright election win).

While kitchen table issues are increasingly important for Israeli voters – the two parties that focused most intensely on these, Yesh Atid and Kulanu, won a total of 21 Knesset seats – the results overall suggest that ideology and security concerns still remain paramount for most Israelis at the ballot box.

And with the ascendance of radical Islamists in the Arab world, rising anti-Semitism in Europe, deep unease about the emerging nuclear deal with Iran and a growing sense of diplomatic isolation in Israel, the right-wing parties – and Likud in particular — were able to capitalize on Israeli fears.

Whether Netanyahu's premiership will be seen as having improved Israel's security or imperiled it may ultimately depend on how history unfolds — and your view of Netanyahu.

What's clear is that with Israel facing threats on multiple fronts, including myriad domestic challenges and a crisis in relations with the U.S. president, Netanyahu has his work cut out for him. ■

Father of seven 'angels' sobs during memorial in Borough Park

JTA
NEW YORK

The Brooklyn father who lost seven of his eight children in a home fire called his kids "a sacrifice" to the community."

Gabriel Sassoon sobbed as he tried to recite the names of his late children — saying they were "angels" — during a eulogy Sunday at a Jewish funeral home in the heavily Orthodox Borough Park section of Brooklyn, the New York Post reported.

"They all had faces of angels. Hashem knows how much I love them," Sassoon said, according to the Post.

He was out of town at a religious conference when the fire consumed his home shortly after midnight Saturday March 21. Officials have blamed an unattended hot plate warming Shabbat meals as the cause.

His wife, Gayle, and one of his daughters, Tziporah, 15, both escaped the blaze by leaping from the house but are fighting for their lives in the hospital. They are unaware of the seven deaths.

About 1,000 people lined the street outside the Shomrei Hadas funeral home for the service, according to the Post. Inside, an overflowing crowd of mourners wailed for the lost children, who ranged in age from five to 16.

The bodies were to be flown to Israel for burial last Monday.

"They were a burnt offering," Sassoon said of his children. "I lost everything in the fire. Seven pure sheep. Those are my seven children."

Gayle Sassoon reportedly had planned to take the children out of town for the weekend - to her parents' home in southern New Jersey — but stayed home because of a snowstorm that hit the New York area.

Authorities identified the victims as girls Eliane, 16; Rivkah, 11; and Sara, 6; and boys David, 12; Yeshua, 10; Moshe, 8; and Yaakob, 5. They were all found in the upstairs bedrooms of the two-story brick-and-wood single-family home in the Midwood section of Brooklyn.

"The horrific tragedy that struck the Sassoon family has left all of us deeply shocked and saddened," State Assemblyman Dov Hikind, who represents the district that the family lives in, said in a statement.

Hikind urged his constituents to check that their smoke detectors are working and the safety of their hot plates.

Gayle Sassoon grew up in Brooklyn, and moved to Israel, where she met her husband. ■

Syrian dentist detained in Turkey claims to work for CSIS

But Ottawa denies any link to apparent facilitator for IS sympathizers

NICK ASHDOWN
ISTANBUL

Mohammad Al Rashed, a 28-year-old Syrian dentist was seized by Turkish authorities on Feb. 28 in a southeastern province near the Syrian border. He's accused of helping three British teenage girls cross from Istanbul to Gaziantep by bus to join the Islamic State (IS).

According to a police report quoted by Turkish media, Rashed claims to be working for Canadian intelligence, who allegedly flew him to Jordan to share information with the Canadian Embassy in Amman.

Canadian authorities said the man is not Canadian and has never been employed by the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS). However, they did not comment on whether or not Rashed has worked with CSIS in the past.

"They may be trying to figure out who this guy actually is, who the Turks believe he is, what his story is," says Prof. Wesley Wark of the University of Ottawa. But Wark, an expert in intelligence and terrorism, has his own theory as to Rashed's relationship with CSIS.

"From the information I have, I would assume that Rashed was a freelancer who was helping not just these three girls but others cross the border into Syria, presumably for money," Wark says.

"For various reasons [Rashed] may have approached Canadian intelligence to see if he could [...] barter what he knew about people smuggling and travel routes to the Canadian authorities."

According to the police report, there is no evidence that Canadian intelligence officials sent Rashed money at any point, though he did receive funds from someone in England. He claimed to have worked for CSIS because he wanted Canadian citizenship.

Wark says that CSIS, which has had agents working overseas in anti-terrorism operations at least since the 9/11 attacks, may very well be working in the region and is definitely interested in information about IS's foreign fighter routes. One of the agency's primary jobs is to develop local sources, often as informants, to supplement one Canadian agent or a very small team in the region.

"You wouldn't have Canadian intelligence operatives themselves trying to penetrate [IS] or engaging in risky cross-border operations into Syria," he says.

But when CSIS uses assets like this, the Canadians typically inform local authorities about it.

"They would be keeping the Turks apprised of the nature of their operations and the identity of their officials in Turkey," he says.

Prof. Wesley Wark

Turkish Foreign Minister Mevlut Çavusoglu publicly accused Rashed of working for a country with the anti-IS coalition, in effect accusing that country of assisting the militant group, while government sources leaked to local media that the country in question is Canada. Footage of Rashed was also released and government-controlled media accused Canada of supporting IS.

Wark is doubtful as to whether CSIS was actually working with Rashed.

"One of the oddities of this case which suggests this guy isn't really in CSIS's control, but is a freelancer, is the way in which the Turkish government responded," he says.

If CSIS didn't inform the Turkish government about Rashed, they may not have been using him as an asset, says Wark. Rashed may very well have approached the Canadians, as many do, but that doesn't mean they worked with him.

Either way, Wark doesn't foresee a degradation in Turkish-Canadian relations, which are generally good.

"Spy spats always blow over in the end, particularly between partners, so I don't suppose it'll have any long-term repercussions."

He says there's a lot of animosity between Turkey and western countries over foreign fighters using the former as a transit route to IS-controlled regions of Syria.

"I think the Turkish government is perhaps understandably angry to find what they believe to be some kind of western intelligence involvement in the very problem they're under such pressure to deal with," he says.

"But it may be that they're exaggerating the circumstances of the case for domestic political consumption, or they don't know really know the full circumstances of the case at this point." ■

Pregnant Canadian trapped in Israel being used: parents

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN, TEL AVIV

Pregnant Canadian single mom Hana Gan is still in Israel after being turned back at the airport Feb. 19 due to a "no exit" order, and her parents have been given custody of her two young sons.

Now 6-1/2 months pregnant, Gan will soon be trapped in Israel by her pregnancy, her supporters fear. Meanwhile, her parents say she's being exploited for political purposes.

Following a hearing on March 3, Gan's parents were awarded custody of her two boys, ages four and six. She has been told by social services that finding an apartment and co-operating with a psychologist's investigation would help her claim. But her defenders argue that she is her children's mother and shouldn't have to prove herself.

"She cannot support herself. She cannot support kids," her father, who asked not to be identified, told The CJN last week. "She never worked in her life, she never had a steady job. If she went back to Canada, she would be on social services. She has addiction problems... she is a sick person. She needs treatment. We want to try to help her."

At the hearing, he said, she was ordered to go for psychiatric evaluation before she could get her children back. "It was supposed to happen two months ago. She refused to do it. She knows her situation."

She is only able to visit her children once a week for two hours in a supervised "contact centre." But her father says she's free to speak to them any time.

However, he believes her supporters are more interested in promoting their own cause than in Hana's well-being or that of her children.

"She's hooked up with some groups that are manipulating her," he said. "She doesn't even know what they're doing to her. This is an anti-Zionist group. They are using her for their political agenda."

Moti Leybel of the Israeli organization Bereaved Parents with Living Children claims to represent "hundreds and hundreds" of Israeli parents whose children have been removed by social services "without any reason." These cases get little attention, he believes, since they don't involve foreign citizens.

Gan's supporters are promoting her cause mainly through the RedressOnline.org website, run by Nureddin Sabir, a Libyan anti-Israel activist.

In a recent audio recording on YouTube, a social worker expressed concern to Gan about publicizing photos and videos of the children through social media channels. "There is a law that you are not supposed to publicize your children. All this involvement of the people whose company you're in... it is not helpful."

In the same clip, the social worker admits that Gan is new to Israel and her situation unknown. "We don't know you... We know you only for a few months... What we know is what you told us, what your parents told us, what the school told us, what the reports to us from Canada told us," the worker said.

In the face of a possible conflict between Gan's right to leave Israel and her children's rights, the social worker is heard explaining that the state has a responsibility to step in to make sure the children are safe. "The more co-operative you will be, the shorter this will take."

However, Gan insisted that there has never been any evidence found, in Canada or in Israel, of negligent parenting.

When contacted for comment, Gan's lawyer Benny Dekel told The CJN, "This is all confidential information." He ignored further requests, as have Gan's other supporters. ■

Skyler Wexler plays Kira in the acclaimed series Orphan Black.

Nine-year-old actress a hit on Orphan Black

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The thought of monsters would be unsettling to most kids – but not to nine-year-old Skyler Wexler of Toronto, who plays Kira in the acclaimed TV series Orphan Black.

"I really like horror stories; I read them a lot. They're not frightening to me," she said.

Skyler is building a repertoire in sci-fi roles, setting her apart from other young actresses. Her first major film was 2012's short The Captured Bird, which played at the Toronto International Film Festival. Described as a darkly poetic fable, it begins with Skyler drawing chalk figures of people on the cement of a playground. An unusual crack in the pavement, which is seeping a mysterious black fluid, captures her interest, and she follows this crack to an ominous building. Inside, she encounters several bizarre phenomena, including walls which bleed black, and tentacles which emerge from the ceiling to touch her. She then witnesses the birth of five terrifying supernatural beings who threaten the existence of her world.

"Skyler was the only human actress acting amongst monsters," said her mother, Charlene Wexler.

"I got to see how they [monsters] were made. I followed the goo into a house and saw a big puddle in one of the rooms. I sat down and it turned into a monster," Skyler said with a big laugh.

As a young child, Skyler would watch kids' programs on TV and ask, why isn't that me?

"I did what any parent would do: I signed her up for drama and singing lessons," said Wexler.

A passion for performing on stage and on camera is what makes Skyler happy.

"She loves to sing at family Chanukah and Purim parties. Skyler directs her young cousins whether it is Shabbat prayers or a holiday play they put together.

"Singing, acting, putting on plays, writing her own plays, and creating her own music is what drives Skyler," said Wexler.

Skyler started acting in commercials for Manulife and Sears, performing in school musicals such as Frozen, Hairspray, and The Wizard of Oz, and singing both the Canadian and American national anthems at the ACC in front of thousands.

Skyler first appeared on the small screen in 2011 in the series Against the Wall. She soon landed roles in Warehouse 13, Alphas, Really Me, Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town, Rewind, We Wanted More, Carrie, and Orphan Black.

With a following of loyal fans, Skyler is best known for her acting role as Kira – the daughter of one of the clones played by Tatiana Maslany – on the TV series Orphan Black, for the last three seasons.

Skyler worked alongside award-winning actress Julianne Moore, who played her mother in the 2013 remake of Carrie, in which Skyler played young Carrie.

> I really like horror stories; I read them a lot. They're not frightening to me.

Skyler also has a musical bent, and writes her own songs.

"I hear her often as she sits at the piano humming whatever she has created, trying to figure out the chord that matches what she is humming. Once she has put it all together, she puts the words to it and there is her song," said Wexler.

Skyler works with vocal coach Marla Joy for a minimum of two hours a week, and with her piano teacher Mark Feldman for one hour a week.

In her music video The House of The Rising Sun, (available on YouTube) Skyler captured both creativity and imagination through song and character equally, pulling the viewer in and demonstrating her depth and range as an artist.

"My concept for this video came from wanting Skyler's fans and audience to be able to see the intensity and the passion with which she performs," Joy says.

Singing for causes such as Sick Kids Hospital, the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, Autism Speaks, Autism Sings and Imagine a Cure for Leukemia, is important to Skyler.

"Skyler brings smiles to kids when she sings," said Wexler. "She often tells me, 'Mummy, I can't believe what my music can do for someone, I didn't realize.'" ■

Margulies' play still as relevant now as it was five years ago

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of the questions Jordan Merkur hopes audiences consider when seeing his production of Donald Margulies' Tony Award-nominated play Time Stands Still is "How do you respond to the news?"

After photojournalist Sarah Goodwin (played by Kirstin Rae Hinton) is injured by an improvised explosive device (IED) in Iraq, she goes back to her Brooklyn home with her partner and fellow journalist James Dodd (Jason Jazrawy). In what Margulies has described as a love story, the show follows the couple for one year as they struggle to return to life outside of a war zone.

Merkur first directed Time Stands Still at Toronto's Fringe Festival in July where it was honoured as a Patron's Pick. Now magazine lauded the show and recognized its outstanding ensemble cast and direction. To remount it, Merkur formed the TSS (Time Stands Still) Collective with his actors and stage manager. Together they worked to raise money for a full run at Theatre Passe Muraille.

Sam Rosenthal – who plays Sarah's editor Richard – produced the show with Merkur and the rest of the collective. While they crowd funded and solicited donations from family and friends, they also got creative and hosted unique events to further engage their prospective audience.

In January, Hinton and Jazrawy – who are a couple both on and off stage – held a murder mystery themed party and in February, Rosenthal hosted a champagne brunch where award-winning Toronto Star journalist Michelle Shepard spoke alongside psychiatrist Dr. Anthony Feinstein, who studies post-traumatic stress disorder.

The event brought in money for the show, but it also made an impact on the actors and guests who heard Shepard and Feinstein reflect on their experiences with foreign conflicts. For Rosenthal, it also changed his perspective on producing theatre. An event such as this, he explains, "galvanizes people into wanting to see the show move forward."

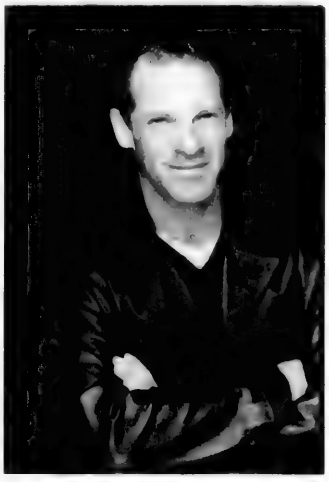
Time Stands Still opened on Broadway in 2010 and starred Laura Linney, Eric Bogosian, Brian D'arcy James and Alicia Silverstone. Merkur thinks it's just as relevant now as it was five years ago.

Journalists today are no longer simply observers in conflict areas. The horrific beheadings of American journalists James Foley and Steven Sotloff, and Japanese freelancer Kenji Goto, remind us how groups such as the Islamic State target members of the media.

In the play, one of the characters doesn't understand why some journalists risk their lives when reporting overseas. She talks about how when she reads a magazine story, she just flips the page and is thankful that she lives in the United States.

Merkur understands that. "I'm here in Canada and most of my family lives now in Israel," he says.

Though Merkur visits them, he knows that their lives are much different than his. "They're dealing with more conflicts than I do living at Carlton and Jarvis," he explains. "And so, for me, when I hear the news in Israel, or I hear news of what occurred in Paris, or the anti-Semitic actions in places in Europe; what do I do about it?"



Jordan Merkur directs Time Stands Still.

> [The play] really deals with some of the issues that we have to deal with as people who are consumers of the news

Merkur has a history of directing and producing socially relevant work. He graduated with a BFA in theatre from York University in 1985. Before he finished school, he was already producing work in downtown Toronto and started his production company Eclectic Theatre in his graduating year.

He ran Eclectic Theatre for 16 years and earned 12 Dora Award nominations, winning five. Afterwards, he was the artistic director at the Red Barn Theatre in Jackson's Point, Ont., until it tragically burned down in 2009.

Now, he's excited for even more people to see Time Stands Still. "A lot of people who are following the stories in the Middle East, or in other places, would find this play quite compelling because," he says, "it really deals with some of the issues that we have to deal with as people who are consumers of the news." ■

Time Stands Still plays at Theatre Passe Muraille Mainspace, 16 Ryerson Ave., until March 29. Tickets can be purchased at the Theatre Passe Muraille Box office, by calling 416-504-7529 or by visiting www.artsboxoffice.ca

Jewnior Games adds life to youth group programs

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

Talia Osiel and Faigie Grunwald saw a gap in the way synagogue youth group programs were typically facilitated and decided to pool their combined 30 years of educational and teaching experience and develop a new model.

"Shuls were entrusting youth programs to high school and university students who, as eager and excited as they were, didn't have the educational background, budget or time to put together a really successful Jewish educational program," Osiel, who has a master's in curriculum writing from OISE and a certificate in Judaic studies education from York University, said.

Last September, she and Grunwald, a certified ECE teacher who has worked as a special education teacher, a preschool teacher and a day camp director, launched Jewnior Games, a company that designs and develops innovative Jewish curricula tailored specifically to synagogue youth groups and supplementary Hebrew schools.

The main idea, Osiel said, was to "create Jewish educational resources that are fun, engaging and attract kids' attention right off the bat."

She said their programs can be characterized as "carnival games meet birthday party, or camp colour war meets board games… All are professionally designed, yet durable, so kids can play in a hands-on way, and really get involved."

Jewnior Games currently delivers programs to eight institutions in the Toronto area, including Shaarei Shomayim, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Temple Kol Ami, Forest Hill Jewish Centre and the Sephardic Kehilla Centre. The plan is to expand into Jewish summer camps and special events.

It also provides leadership training. Osiel and Grunwald meet with the staff of each synagogue or school to teach leadership skills and get feedback about what works and what doesn't.

"We go through everything," Osiel said. "like how to play [the games], how to manage a successful youth group, how to make games that are competitive but fun, how to involve the shy child, how to get kids to co-operate respectfully… plus different ways to use the materials, what arts and crafts complement the program, and even what snacks to serve to best develop a concept."

Jewnior Games programming is divided into two streams: "Mini champs" (for children from preschool to Grade 3), and "Champs" (children grades 3 to 6).

Osiel explained that the games and activities, while lively and fun, integrate learning about topics like Shabbat and holiday rituals, blessings, Israel, and values from the Torah and texts like Pirkei Avot.

She described the programming as "denominationally neutral" and stressed that the activities require no prior knowledge.

"We're not here to cater to a particular market or push any specific Jewish mandate," she said, "but to get kids to explore their connection to Judaism and to get them involved in a way that's fun and positive."

Osiel and Grunwald design and plan the curriculum for each program, taking into account the shul or school's individual needs in terms of group size and time allotted.

Jewnior Games' signature bags contain an array of games and resources.

> "We're not here to cater to a particular market or push any specific Jewish mandate"
> Talia Osiel

They then give their ideas to local graphic designers and tradespeople, who construct the materials for them. These include large, vinyl floor mats on which to play games, tents, soccer balls and portable, three-dimensional tunnels.

After Osiel and Grunwald meet with staff, they decide together which items should be used for a specific class or program. The different materials for each week are packed into Jewnior Games' trademark, bright cloth bags, which are colour co-ordinated according to age group.

Osiel emphasized that the element of surprise and discovery is part of what makes the experience exciting and dynamic for kids.

"The whole thing is, 'What's in the bag?'" she said. "And it's amazing what comes out of the bag… It's always a new game, a new challenge, something different… The vinyl floor mats, which roll out, are very popular, as kids can run and stand on and move pieces on them."

She noted that all resources are "bright, exciting and very durable," as well as minimally wasteful.

Instead of each individual shul or school youth group leader creating a game or lesson on Bristol board and subsequently throwing it out, the Jewnior Games materials function as shared, reusable resources.

Osiel and Grunwald hope to begin holding cross-institutional staff training, so that staff from different organizations can share ideas and best practices.

"We don't want a divide, a sort of 'Who has the best program?'" Osiel said. "We want this to be more of a collaborative, community effort." ■

KlezFactor leader is a player and a scholar

RUTH SCHWEITZER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Mike Anklewicz, a clarinettist in two klezmer bands and who has with roots in jazz and classical music, is a fearless musical explorer.

Anklewicz has recorded with the Czech-based punk jazz band Eggnoise, playing clarinet on the band's amazingly eclectic CD, Yolk. He described Yolk as "Steely Dan meets '80s prog rock," citing such diverse influences as Frank Zappa and Paul Simon. "The electronic stuff is easier to listen to than Nine Inch Nails," Anklewicz noted.

Anklewicz was at a Montreal conference on improvisation where he met one of Eggnoise's leaders, Ondrez Galuska. "We were roommates at the conference and we traded music," Anklewicz said. He ended up visiting Galuska in Prague, where they recorded tracks for Yolk.

Anklewicz leads the Canadian klezmer fusion band KlezFactor, which was formed in 2004. The group performs traditional and original compositions, fusing klezmer with jazz, rock and classical musical techniques. Klezmachine, the band's most recent CD, topped university radio charts in Ontario and also got radio play in other parts of Canada, the United States, Argentina, France, Portugal, Spain and Russia.

Anklewicz lived in Berlin for a year, where he played with a Berlin-based version of KlezFactor. Reminiscing about the music scene there, he said, like Toronto, there's not a lot of money to be made performing because paid gigs are hard to find. He added that musicians often get together to play for enjoyment rather than money and "if they perform, it's outside Berlin at festivals."

Anklewicz began playing klezmer in the late 1990s, while he was studying music at Queen's University. By the year 2000, he was attending KlezKamp, the annual Yiddish folk arts program that was held in the Catskills.

Anklewicz said that growing up he was exposed to a wide array of music, from classical to the 1960s folk music of Peter, Paul and Mary and The Travellers.

"Klezmer was a big part of the landscape," he said, adding that his parents took him to chassidic festivals to hear klezmer.

Anklewicz's interest in klezmer extends to the academic side of the music. In addition to a bachelor's degree from Queen's, he holds a master of music degree from the New England Conservatory in Boston and received a PhD in ethnomusicology from York University in 2013. His dissertation, Musical Hybridities and the Klezmer Revival looks at klezmer from its historical aspects, when it was blended with early jazz, to the current scene.

"Klezmer today comes from what people have access to," Anklewicz said, citing Socalled, who combines hip hop and klezmer, and pianist Marilyn Lerner, whose influences include Debussy, avant-garde composer John Cage and free jazz pioneer Cecil Taylor.

> Klezmer today comes from what people have access to.

Anklewicz will be giving a four-part lecture about klezmer at Toronto's Royal Conservatory of Music, where he teaches saxophone, beginning on April 15.

"I'll try to give people a taste of the history of the music and how it developed," he said. "The lecture is going to give me the opportunity to go into a lot of detail and play a lot of music."

He will travel once more this summer to take part in a musicology conference in Astana, Kazakhstan. At this writing, he's scheduled to perform in Prague with the Toronto-based world-music artist Lenka Lichtenberg and in Amsterdam with a traditional klezmer trio. He's also playing with KlezFactor in Berlin and Dresden.

Locally, you can catch Anklewicz's trio playing traditional klezmer at the Free Times Cafe on May 3 for the "Bella, Did Ya Eat?" brunch. He's at Solel Congregation in Mississauga on May 23 for a performance and lecture.■

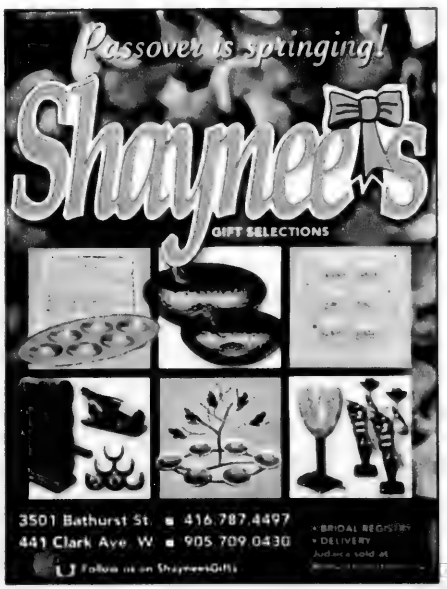
'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.



New Haggadah distinctly Canadian

MARTIN LOCKSHIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Over the last half-century, the Jews of Canada have grown from the world's sixth-largest Jewish community to the fourth. Sadly, this is due in part to the decline of other communities, but it is also a function of our growing size and vitality.

The Jews of Canada, however, have not developed their own institutions to the extent that the three larger Jewish communities of the world have. Israel, the United States and France all have rabbinical schools of various Jewish denominations – Canada has none. Almost all Canadian rabbis are foreign trained, and most are foreign born. Very few Hebrew or Yiddish books are published in Canada. Recently, the Orthodox Jewish community here was pleased when a major Jewish publisher, Koren, printed a so-called Canadian version of its excellent Koren-Sacks prayer book.

What made this prayer book Canadian? One page. The prayer for the government and president of the United States is replaced with an almost identically worded prayer for Canada's government and prime minister.

Rabbi Adam Scheier, senior rabbi at Shaar Hashomayim congregation of Montreal, and Richard Marceau, author of the autobiographical A Quebec Jew: From Bloc Québécois MP to Jewish Activist, have teamed up to address this imbalance, along with the talented Canadian graphic designer Lewis Robinovitch. The result is beautiful and creative. Their distinctly Canadian trilingual Passover Haggadah was printed in Canada and published by Rabbi Scheier's synagogue.

Haggadot have traditionally been the most popular liturgical vehicle for Jewish artwork. Instead of illustrations and illuminations, this Haggadah contains about 100 pictures of Canadian Jewish life, many from the early years of the 20th century.

Some of the pictures are loosely connected to the nearby Hebrew text, such as the one of the Jewish Old Folks home on Cecil Street in Toronto from the 1920s, opposite the verse from the grace after meals, "I was once young and now I am old…"

Other pictures are connected generally to Passover, such as the advertisement from the Canadian Jewish Review of 1923 urging consumers to purchase Ward's Orange Crush in the "Krinkly Bottle" as a "Passover delight." Many are simply curious items from Canadian Jewish history, such as the ticket, in Yiddish and English, to the Toronto Labour Lyceum's "First Annual Fruit Ball," which took place on a Friday night in 1927.

Aside from pictures of Jewish Canadiana, other elements make the Haggadah specifically Canadian. The traditional Hebrew texts are translated into both English and French, and all instructions appear in our two official languages as well. The grace after meals includes a 12-word Hebrew prayer for Canada (and a nine-word Hebrew prayer for Israel, the only two additions to the traditional Hebrew Haggadah text). Most significantly, 19 Canadian rabbis explain and elucidate different parts of the Haggadah.

The Haggadah consistently uses gender-neutral language in both English and French. (The English translation of the text was adapted, with permission, from Noam Zion's excellent Israeli haggadot, A Different Night and A Night to Remember.) The Haggadah is also unabashedly non-denominational: the contributing rabbis, women and men, come from across Canada and from all the major Jewish denominations. (Full disclosure: I, too, appear in the Canadian Haggadah, with a short reflection on the controversial Shfoch Chamatecha prayer, the one that calls on God to "pour out fury on the nations that do not know God.") As far as I can tell, all 19 contributing rabbis are anglophones (as are most Canadian rabbis), but their comments also appear in French translation.

Canadian Haggadah Canadienne
Compiled and edited by Rabbi Adam Scheier and Richard Marceau
Koren

One of the most thoughtful insights into the text of the Haggadah was provided by my York University colleague, Rabbi Michael Brown, writing about the Ha lachma anya prayer near the beginning of the seder, which invites all who are hungry to come and eat with us. After restating some of the traditional explanations for the inclusion of such sentiments at the beginning of the seder, Rabbi Brown provides his own (more convincing, in my opinion) reason.

In the Torah, the mitzvah of remembering the Exodus from Egypt is frequently coupled with the call for Jews to reach out to the disadvantaged of society. For example, "When you gather the grapes of your vineyard, do not pick it over again; that [i.e. what remains on the vine] shall go to the stranger, the orphan and the widow. Always remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt; therefore do I enjoin you to observe this commandment." (Deuteronomy 24:21-22)

Rabbi Brown explains: "Remembering [that we were slaves in Egypt] is not simply a thought or a word. We are enjoined to act, to look after the weak and the needy… And unfortunately, even in our prosperous society, the needy are very much with us: the homeless, the refugees, the mentally ill, the poor. Our seders can be enriched by including them."

This prayer and commentary are accompanied by two illustrations: a Canadian Jewish Congress pamphlet titled "What about their Passover in 1946?" illustrated with a picture of Jewish war refugees, and a blurb from 1926 from the Hebrew Aid Society of Vancouver, describing how they distribute Passover provisions not just to needy Jewish homes, but also to "Jewish inmates in hospitals, asylums and penitentiaries."

I know my own seder this year will also be enriched by use of this handsome and thoughtful Haggadah. ■

PASSOVER FOOD

Welcome to my virtual kitchen!

NORENE GILLETZ
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

With almost 4,200 cooks in my virtual Facebook kitchen, it's quite a challenge to answer everyone's cooking questions, plus offer menu suggestions and recipes. There's a constant stream of interesting recipes being posted by foodies from around the world. There are members from Australia, Israel, United States, Canada, England, Mexico, Germany, even the Netherlands. Each Shabbat or Jewish holiday, there are posts from members wishing each other Shabbat Shalom or Chag Sameach. The members refer to each other as 'Noreners,' a term coined by Aviva Bursten Cohen of Winnipeg.

A few weeks ago, several members asked if we could set up a selection of Passover recipes within Norene's Kitchen! Lois Held of Atlanta stepped up to the plate and used her excellent computer skills to set up special files with recipes for various categories: soups and starters, salads, sides, miscellaneous, vegetarian, chicken, desserts, plus dairy, fish and meat sections. Cookbook author, Barbara Wasser of Niskayuna, N.Y., a frequent poster, suggested the various categories – teamwork at its finest!

Lois Held is a popular poster in Norene's Kitchen and her recipes always receive rave reviews. Her Lemon Baked Chicken is no exception.

Lois shared: "I have been making this luscious chicken for years – ever since it appeared on a Manischewitz product order list. My family loved it and I have been making it since the kids were little. I always double the recipe!"

Lois Held's Lemon Baked Chicken

- ❑ 1 whole lemon
- ❑ 1 frying chicken, cut into eight pieces
- ❑ 3/4 cup matzah meal
- ❑ salt
- ❑ 3/4 tsp. paprika
- ❑ 1 egg
- ❑ 2 tbsp. water
- ❑ peanut oil
- ❑ 2 tbsp. sugar
- ❑ 1 unpeeled lemon, thinly sliced
- ❑ 1 can (10-1/2 oz) condensed clear chicken soup, undiluted

Grate the rind of the whole lemon and set the rind aside. Cut the lemon in half and squeeze the juice of both halves over the chicken. Mix matzah meal with salt and paprika. Beat the egg with the water.

Dip the chicken first into the egg mixture and then into the matzah meal mixture.

Heat 1/4 in. of oil in a large skillet and slowly brown the chicken pieces.

Place the browned chicken pieces into a roasting pan. Sprinkle the grated lemon rind over the chicken, making sure to put some on each piece.

Sprinkle with sugar and arrange lemon slices on the chicken. Add the soup (I use homemade) and cover.

Bake at 375 about 45 minutes, or until chicken is done. Serves 3 to 4.

Daniella Silver of Toronto, an exciting new personality in the world of Jewish cooking, has an extraordinary sense of colour and presentation. I've been working together with Daniella for more than two years to help create her exciting new cookbook, The Silver Platter: Simple to Spectacular, which will be launched in Toronto on May 5. Recipes include easily accessible ingredients, clear instructions, gorgeous photographs, "Norene's Notes" with tips and techniques, plus full nutritional information for every dish listed in an appendix. More than 100 recipes are gluten-free, and many are ideal for Passover.

Daniella wrote: "My family has a long history of artistic talent. We all seem to have developed our creativity in different ways. Mine has manifested itself through food. Its presentation, the colour of the ingredients, and the blending of textures are all aspects of an art form. Food has to look beautiful to be appetizing. This recipe is made with simple ingredients and the finished dish is absolutely spectacular!"

Daniella Silver's Sweet Potato Scallop

This simple, unassuming scallop is both sweet and savoury. Using sweet potatoes instead of white makes it a healthier option. As a final bonus, the elegant upright presentation gives the dish some textural interest that is worthy of any holiday feast. It should not be frozen.

- ❑ 1/4 cup olive oil
- ❑ 1/4 cup honey
- ❑ 1 tsp ground cinnamon
- ❑ 2 tsp chopped rosemary
- ❑ 6 medium sweet potatoes, thinly sliced (do not peel)
- ❑ kosher salt
- ❑ freshly ground black pepper

Preheat oven to 400. Coat a large oven-to-table baking dish with nonstick cooking spray.

In a large bowl, combine oil, honey, cinnamon, and rosemary. Add sweet potatoes; sprinkle lightly with salt and pepper. Stir to coat on all sides.

Arrange sweet potato slices in prepared baking dish by standing them upright in tight rows. You should have parallel lines of sweet potato slices (skin showing) along the length of the dish. Drizzle with any remaining oil mixture.

Bake, covered, for 45 minutes.

Bake, uncovered, an additional 20-30 minutes, until golden and glazed.

Norene's Notes

Variation: Sprinkle sweet potato slices generously with salt and pepper. Add 3 tbsp. olive oil, 2 tbsp. honey, and 1/4 cup chopped fresh basil or dill. Stir well. Arrange sweet potato slices in baking dish as directed in step 3. Bake, covered, for 45 minutes. Uncover; bake 20-30 minutes longer.

Quick Tip: The sweet potatoes can be sliced with a food processor, using medium pressure. Yields 8 servings ■

Bloggers dish up Passover twists in an ebook

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Thanks to the vision of four dedicated and tech-savvy online friends, Jewish cooking is entering the modern age with 4 Bloggers Dish: Passover: Modern Twists on Traditional Flavors.

The four bloggers are Whitney Fisch (JewHungryTheBlog.com), Amy Kritzer (WhatJewWannaEat.com), Sarah Lasry (ThePatchkePrincess.com) and Liz Rueven (KosherLikeMe.com). Each offers a slightly different take, from Whitney's Southern kosher inspirations to Liz's "flexitarian" style.

With over 50 recipes like Dilly Leek Croquettes, Gnocchi, Homemade Tomato Sauce and Quinoa Meatballs and Cinnamon "Donut" Holes, the book offers a wealth of breezy, fun possibilities.

More than its unique flavours, though, what sets 4 Bloggers Dish apart is that it's an ebook. It's not available in print at all. But the big plus is that it only costs $3.99 (US) on Amazon. And you don't have to wait for delivery, either: start flipping through recipes instantly on almost any device, including your computer screen, with Amazon's Kindle reader application.

"The biggest challenge, but also the most fun," Kritzer told The CJN, "was making sure the recipes we each contributed were varied enough, and hit all the Passover classics, with a twist, like matzah ball soup and potato kugel. Working with three other authors needs a bit more organization, but the result is more point of views and more recipes."

4 Bloggers Dish includes dairy recipes and gebrochts. There's also plenty of meat on offer, in surprising flavour combinations.

For more information, or to buy the book, visit 4bloggersdish.com or search Amazon for "4 bloggers dish."

Shakshuka With Feta And Cilantro

Whitney says, "I had never even heard of shakshuka until I was studying abroad in Be'er Sheva, Israel during my junior year of college. I was invited over to a friend's house for lunch and she served us this dish, which I thought was glorified marinara sauce baked with eggs. It wasn't until I experimented with making my own a few years later that I really fell in love with the dish. Now a staple in our household, it's the perfect one pot meal for Passover or any time of year."

- ❑ 5 tbsp coconut or vegetable oil
- ❑ 1 medium onion, diced
- ❑ 4 cloves of garlic, diced
- ❑ 1 red pepper, chopped
- ❑ 1 green pepper, chopped
- ❑ 1 can of whole tomatoes
- ❑ 1 can of diced tomatoes
- ❑ 5 eggs
- ❑ 1 tbsp. kosher salt
- ❑ 1/2 tbsp. pepper
- ❑ 1 tsp. cumin
- ❑ 1 tbsp. hot sauce
- ❑ handful of cilantro leaves and stems, diced
- ❑ feta cheese (to taste)

Heat a deep, large skillet or sauté pan on medium. Slowly warm oil in the pan. Add chopped onion, sauté for a few minutes until the onion becomes slightly translucent.

Add a dash of salt, pepper and cumin to the onions and stir.

Add the garlic and continue to sauté until mixture is fragrant.

Next, add bell peppers and continue sautéing for another 6 – 8 minutes or until peppers start to brown.

Add both cans of tomatoes to pan, stir until blended. Add more of the cumin and hot sauce to the pan of vegetables, as desired (to taste).

Stir well, and allow mixture to simmer over low-medium heat for 6 – 8 minutes (break apart some of the whole tomatoes at this point too – just push down with a spoon to break them apart). Taste the mixture and season to taste.

Before cracking each egg into the pan, make a little divot in sauce for egg to go into.

Crack the eggs, one at a time, directly over the tomato mixture, making sure to space them evenly over the sauce. It's common shakshuka practice to place 4 eggs around the outer edge and 1 in the center. The eggs will cook "over easy" style on top of the tomato sauce.

Cover your pan and allow to simmer for an additional 10 – 15 minutes.

Keep an eye on the eggs to make sure that the yolks remain "over easy" to "over medium."

Add feta, if desired, halfway through this final 10 – 15 minutes of cooking.

Garnish with cilantro and serve. Serves 4

Matzo Ball Potato Chowder

A recipe from Amy, who calls this "A cheesy, creamy broth with chunks of tender potatoes and carrots and light fluffy matzo dumplings."

For matzo balls:

- 3 eggs, separated
- 1/2 cup vegetable stock
- 1 cup matzah meal
- 1/4 cup onion, grated
- 3 tbsp. olive oil or schmaltz
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- 1/4 tsp. black pepper
- 1/2 cup cheddar cheese, shredded

For chowder:

- 4 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
- 1 large white onion, diced
- 1 cup carrots, washed, peeled and diced
- 1 cup celery, diced
- 1/2 cup dry white wine
- 2 quarts (just under 2 litres) vegetable stock (homemade or store bought)
- 2 lb. russet potatoes (about 2 potatoes), washed, peeled and diced into ½-in.cubes. Set in water until using to keep from turning brown.
- 1 1/2 cups half and half
- kosher salt and black pepper to taste
- pinch cayenne
- 1/2 cup cheddar cheese, shredded or more to taste
- 1/4 cup fresh parsley, minced

First, make your matzah balls. In a medium bowl, whisk 1/2 cup stock with the egg yolks. Then whisk in matzah meal, onion, olive oil, salt, pepper and cheese.

In a separate bowl, beat egg whites until frothy. Gently fold into the matzah meal mixture, careful not to over mix. Refrigerate for 30 minutes.

When ready to cook, bring 2 quarts of water to a boil in a large, wide stockpot and lower to a simmer. Form the batter into 24 1- to 1 1/2 in. balls.

Place balls in the water, cover, and simmer for 30 minutes until matzah balls puff up and are cooked through.

Meanwhile, in a large 4-quart stockpot heat olive oil over medium heat. Add onion, carrots and celery and sauté until onions are translucent and carrots and celery soft, about 7 minutes.

Add white wine to deglaze while stirring. Mix in stock and bring to a simmer.

Add potatoes and simmer 15 minutes until fork tender.

Pour in half and half, add matzah balls and bring back to a simmer.

Season with cayenne, salt and pepper to taste (depending on how salty your stock is). Top each serving with shredded cheese and parsley.

Notes: Can be made up to 3 days ahead up to Step 5. When ready to serve, simmer with half and half, add matzah balls and serve. Makes 8 bowls ■

Potato chips with trendy touch

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

One of the latest trends in desserts is the combination of sweet and salty flavours in one dish. I noticed that supermarkets have recently begun selling chocolate covered potato chips.

I resisted the temptation to buy them, until I did some Passover shopping. Then I tried some dark chocolate-covered potato chips. They were quite delicious, but I thought I could make my own, so I purchased kosher-for-Passover bittersweet chocolate chips, 100-g dark chocolate bars and six 6-oz. bags of salted rippled potato chips (I wanted to leave room for error).

I went online to check out some recipes for chocolate-covered potato chips. Some recipes called for submerging the total chip in chocolate like the Passover variety I tried. I opted for partially covered chips, because this method was less messy. The recipes I saw all called for chocolate and shortening. I used margarine instead, which is readily available at Passover. The recipe is easy, but time consuming. The results were very good, so I'm going to make them for one of the seders.

Dark Chocolate-Covered Potato Chips

- 2 tbsp. margarine
- 1 cup bittersweet pareve chocolate chips
- 2 oz. dark chocolate (72 per cent cocoa)
- 48 to 50 whole rippled potato chips

Line 2 large baking sheets with parchment paper and set aside. In a medium heatproof bowl set over a small saucepan of barely simmering water, combine chocolate chips, chocolate and margarine, stirring occasionally, until completely melted and smooth.

Dip one potato chip at a time halfway into the bowl of melted chocolate. Use a spoon to coat chip with chocolate, leaving the top quarter bare. Lift chip out of the chocolate, allowing any excess to drip back into the bowl, and place coated chip on the lined baking sheet. Repeat until all the potato chips and/or chocolate have been used up. Allow chips to set at room temperature until the chocolate is firm, about 2 hours. Makes about 4 dozen chips. ■

Passover desserts – time to start baking

FRANCINE KURLANDSKI
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It is no big surprise that everyone loves desserts. At the end of a delicious meal, especially one as important as the seder meal, you want to wow and impress your family and guests, and leave them with a sweet, lasting impression.

I start early with the Passover baking, in a carefully prepared area in the kitchen. With all the daily reminders to keep a healthier diet, I try to look for recipes with minimal amounts of matzah meal as a lot of it tends to make the dessert heavy.

By freezing some of these desserts beforehand, you will be able to free up some much needed time for cooking and the preparation that has to be done the day of the seder.

Pesach Chocolate Chip Cookies

- 3 eggs
- 1/2 cup margarine
- 1 cup sugar
- 1 cup cake meal
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- 1/2 cup potato starch
- 1 package chocolate chips
- 2/4 toasted walnuts or pecans

Beat eggs, margarine and sugar together.

Combine dry ingredients and add to egg mixture. Add chocolate chips and nuts. Mix well.

Drop by spoonfuls on cookie sheet. Bake at 350 for approximately 10-13 minutes. Remove from pan quickly, and cool.

Melting Moments Cookies

- Passover jam of your choice
- 4 egg yolks; 4 egg whites
- 3/4 cup oil
- 3/4 cup sugar
- 1/4 tsp. salt
- juice of 1 orange
- 1 cup cake meal
- 1/2 cup potato starch
- 1 cup pecans crushed

Combine all ingredients except jam and crushed nuts and allow to stand 5 minutes.

Make dough into balls, dip into slightly beaten egg white, roll in nuts. Place the balls on a cookie sheet lined with parchment. Make a dent in the centre of each cookie ball. Bake at 350 for 5 minutes.

Remove from the oven, place jam in centres, return to oven for an additional 15 -20 minutes.

Apple Pudding

- 3 pieces matzah
- 3 medium apples
- 3/4 cup raisins (optional)
- 1 cup sugar
- 1 tsp cinnamon
- 2 tbsp. margarine
- 3 eggs beaten
- rind from 1 lemon, and 1 orange

Soak matzah in cold water until soft; drain well. Peel and grate or thinly slice apples. Combine with remaining ingredients. Pour into greased casserole. Bake at 350 for 20 to 25 minutes. Serve hot. ■

SENIOR SIDE OF LIFE

Music and mandelbrot

Dr. Michael Gordon

I was at a concert given by the Toronto Symphony with Canadian pianist Jan Lisiecki playing Beethoven's fifth piano concerto – one of my favourites. As the piece started, I was taken back to my early teens, when one of my dearest aunts, Marion, came with her family to visit us at my family's small bungalow a few blocks from the Brighton Beach on whose sands I spent much of my youth.

We had recently moved into this little house. For the first time in my life, I had my own room, as previously I shared the one bedroom in our family's apartment with my sister and grandmother. We moved in the early 1950s, soon after my grandmother died.

My small room was my castle – I designed and built desks and shelves and cabinets so that it was very efficiently compact. At one end, opposite the foot of my single, narrow bed was my treasure – my music cabinet that had my turntable, the amplifier with the speakers being spread around the room for "stereophonic" effect, although the vinyl records themselves were monaural with "stereo" only coming to the public a few years later.

Marion, knowing my love for music, brought me a recording of a new release, Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, "Emperor," played by the renowned Robert Casadesus with the New York Philharmonic under the famous conductor Dmitri Mitropoulos, first released in 1955.

As was my habit, like that of any musicophile who received such a precious gift, I repeatedly listened to the red-sleeved record until its beauty embedded itself in my psyche. It forever resonates with the memories of my youth and my associations with Marion and her family, which was the case that night at Roy Thomson Hall.

In addition to the record she brought me, she delivered a box of her famous mandelbrot, of which she was a true master baker.

Why was Marion important to me? She was the wife of my mother's only brother, an art history professor and painter and the mother of my only two first cousins on my mother's side. She was a talented and creative person, a lover of and teacher of English literature with a deep, sonorous voice. Her love of literature resonated with me, and in my adolescent years, I loved to read, especially fiction, a habit that has not left me. She elevated reading to "the art of literature."

Another thing I associate with Marion was that she spoke Yiddish beautifully (which I basically understood from hearing my grandmother speak it to my mother about taboo subjects.)

Marion was also what I would call a gourmet cook, something my own mother was not. Having a meal at Marion's was always an adventure for me, and if luck would have it, she baked something for dessert, her mandelbrot being her tour de force.

She unfortunately had to deal with her own personal tragedies. Her young est daughter died in an automobile accident during a time when she was somewhat estranged from the family, and she did not have the chance to truly reconcile, especially with her father.

The impact was lifelong, even though Marion continued with her career. As other aspects of her life slowly unravelled, she always found areas of pure joy, which she dwelled on, including the extraordinary success of her son, my cousin, and his family. Every phone conversation, as our personal visits became fewer, focused on her family, and that mattered a lot, because it gave her solace, as did the joy of teaching, which she continued to do until just a few years before her death.

She was an important part of the fabric of my family and of my growing up. And the red-sleeved cover of the Casadesus recording was part of our strong bond, which I recall every time I hear the music in concert or as a recording. ■

Yacov Fruchter reminds parents and children to open their hearts to each other
Rabbi Shalom Spira explains the nuances of 'kosherizing' vessels before Pesach
Rachael Turkienicz says Shabbat Hagadol reminds us of the power of choice

Yacov Fruchter

The Shabbat before Pesach is referred to as "Shabbat Hagadol" – Shabbat of Greatness. One explanation is that this was the day the Jewish People in Egypt defied their slave masters by slaughtering sheep, an Egyptian deity. This assertion of power and trust in God was an important step in their march towards freedom that we celebrate on Pesach.

Another reason for the name can be found in the words of the Haftorah for Shabbat Hagadol, from the prophet Malachi. He famously ends his prophesy with the idea that on "the great and awesome day" Eliyahu the prophet will be sent to perform a great task.

This is the same Eliyahu Hanavi (the prophet) that visits us at the seder. And what is the great act that Eliyahu will perform on this "great day" as promised to us on the "Great" Shabbat?

"Vheishiv lev avot" – "And I shall return the hearts of the parents to the children, and the hearts of the children to their parents, lest I strike the land with destruction."

Really? Is that the extent of what will transpire on the "great and awesome" day? Does it really require the restorative powers of Elijah to remind parents and their children to turn their hearts to one another? Is the relationship between families, generations and loved ones so broken that a miracle is required to heal the wounds?

Sadly, we know that the words of Malachi continue to ring true today. If we can just learn to open our hearts to our parents, both to share and to listen, and accept the gifts of their hearts, our world would indeed be a very different place. We need children who are willing to share with their parents their most challenging questions, and parents who see their kids as more complex than being able to fit into one of four categories. If we don't, we will continue on a path toward suffering and brokenness. ■

Rabbi Shalom Spira

"And if it was cooked in a copper vessel, [the latter] shall be wiped and rinsed with water." (Leviticus 6:21). The Gemara, Avodah Zarah 76a, decodes this to mean that after the ritual deadline for eating any offering passes, there is a mitzvah to wash the metal vessel in which the offering was cooked. Following this cleansing, we must independently purge the vessel in boiling water (hagalah) to "kosherize" it, just as Numbers 31:21-23 requires for treif metal cookery. This is because the sacrificial flavour that is absorbed within the utensil walls has become forbidden following the deadline.

Nevertheless, concludes the Gemara, although Numbers 31:21-23 demands the more powerful purification of blow-torching (libbun) for treif metal pyrolysis equipment (e.g., shish kabob spits), such is never required for sacrificial utensils. Hagalah will always suffice in the Temple, because at the time the offering was roasted (prior to the deadline), the foodstuff was still kosher (heteira bala).

This distinction leads some decisors to claim that the same is true for utensils in which chametz was toasted prior to Pesach. Because chametz was still kosher then, hagalah will suffice to kosherize the vessel for Pesach. Others counter that chametz is more stringent than the case of expired offerings, because once Pesach arrives, there will not be even one moment during which chametz is permissible. The latter school indeed prescribes libbun. (See Encyclopedia Talmudit, s.v. hagalah, sec. 11.)

Rabbi Menasheh Klein (Teshuvot Mishneh Halakhot 6:93) envisages this controversy as bearing a further ramification regarding when to sell chametz for a Jew who will celebrate Pesach in a different time zone than his/her home (where the chametz merchandise is stored). If chametz is heteira bala, then it is a homocentric prohibition, whereas if libbun is indeed required, then chametz is a nutrient-centric prohibition. Rabbi Klein prefers that one cover both possibilities. ■

Rachael Turkienicz

The Shabbat before Pesach is called "Shabbat Hagadol," the Great Shabbat. We might think that one of the Sabbaths before the High Holidays would be "The Great One," and yet it's the one before Pesach.

The unusual thing about that Shabbat, long ago in Egypt, was that God commanded the Israelites to choose a lamb for sacrifice, separate it from the flock and keep it separate for three days. It seems like such a simple task, but the text already mentioned that the Egyptians didn't view animals the way the Israelites did. For an ancient Egyptian, the lamb had a level of godhood. To select one, separate and designate it for slaughter was to make yourself a target. The Egyptians would never take kindly to this action.

Jewish commentaries point out that this was the first commandment the Israelites actively chose to do. If they were inclined to be Egyptian, they would not select a lamb. If they chose God over Egypt, they would follow the commandment. It was the moment of great choice.

Every choice in life involves two steps: turning away and turning toward. This was first described to us with Abraham and Sarah, the first Jews. "Lech lecha," leave the old world, turn away, and turn toward the new unknown. That moment of first choice is the greatest of moments. It's the time a new door opens and we find the courage, or perhaps the trust, to cross its threshold.

The Greatest Shabbat, Shabbat Hagadol, is that first moment of choosing – turning away from Egypt and turning toward God. Sometimes we're so busy with reaching our goals that we don't notice our greatest moments of choice. Shabbat Hagadol reminds us to take note of those moments. ■

Cotler met his future wife as he helped make peace

"Begin looked at me and said, 'She [Zeevi] is my confidante for all things.' In other words, she's in the meeting."

"Then I shared with Begin the contents of the note… I gave it to him," Cotler said.

"He read the note and said these conditions are unacceptable," he recalled. "I said, 'I didn't say the conditions were acceptable to you. I'm just conveying to you the fact that these are the conditions [Sadat] conveyed but that he would want to explore. Peace negotiations would ensue, and I believe they're worth exploring.'

"He asked if Sadat was sincere," Cotler continued.

"'Yes, I have no doubt about his sincerity. I have no doubt about his commitment to peace,'" he replied.

And while Begin again repeated that Sadat's conditions were unacceptable, Cotler suggested the overture was still worth exploring.

"That's exactly what happened."

There were other back channels being explored at the time – one involved famed Israeli military and political leader Moshe Dayan.

After delivering his letter, Cotler's role was limited, "other than to report back."

No doubt peace talks would have resulted even without his contribution.

But don't underestimate the importance of personal relationships, he said.

Begin and Sadat met and developed a personal rapport that helped them overcome political and diplomatic obstacles and, in the end, make peace.

"I believe it would not have happened had they not developed this personal relationship between them," he suggests.

"The initial trust that developed between them presaged the agreement. Without that personal relationship, there would not have been that agreement," Cotler said.

There have been reports that there was friction between the two leaders, but Cotler believes they did get along.

Bottom line: they each trusted that the other was truly committed to peace.

Cotler has said little to date about his role in launching the peace talks. They were reported briefly in 1977 and again four years ago in a report in Israel by journalist David Horovitz.

But this year, on the 36th anniversary of the Israel Egypt peace treaty, Cotler believes it's time to complete the record.

> We had our differences then, we have our differences now

And there's another aspect of the story that bears mentioning.

Not only did Begin and Sadat develop a personal relationship, so, too, did Cotler and Zeevi. At the time, Cotler was aligned with the Meretz Party, which was on the left wing of the Israeli political spectrum. Zeevi, of course, was a prominent Likudnik.

"We had our differences then, we have our differences now," Cotler said.

It took about two years before Egypt and Israel's rapprochement – the same length of time as Cotler's courtship.

On March 26, 1979, the day the peace treaty was signed in Washington, Cotler and Zeevi were married.

And while Cotler's cameo appearance in one historical event ended, he went on to play a more prominent role in the other. ■

Jewish high schools said to help attract families

Before coming to Toronto, Rabbi Buckman headed an Atlanta Jewish school that turned around its enrolment figures. While he is still learning about the Canadian experience, he said, "I would be very cautious about projecting a decline in enrolment for too many years out."

Vancouver, with 190 students in King David High School, up from 140 students four years ago, is proof that there are strategies that can reverse declining enrolment.

Ari Shiff, co-president of King David High School, said he found Jewish day schools were in difficult financial straits when he and his young family first moved to Vancouver from Toronto several years ago.

Applying the same principles he used to run his business, he and a group of like-minded community members began to overhaul the Jewish day school system.

One of the first things they did was to help the schools qualify for a higher level of government funding, which currently deposits an extra $500,000 into the schools' coffers annually.

Ottawa's main community high school announced last month that it is closing.

Even while the schools were in the red, money was spent to improve education, increase financial assistance and build fundraising departments in each elementary school. A concerted push to attract parents who could pay full tuition was also made.

To keep the high school healthy, growth must happen at both ends, with strong preschool programs in the elementary schools and innovative offerings at the high school, he said.

King David, for example, is initiating a new outdoor education program. "We go out and write grant proposals, and we bring in other donors. Eventually it grows the enrolment. It starts to attract a whole different crowd than we were attracting before," Shiff said.

Having a thriving high school changes the Jewish culture of the entire city, Shiff said.

Many years ago, his wife's family left Vancouver to find Jewish education for their teenaged children. Today, kosher bakeries, butcher shops, yeshivas and even a mohel are more likely to stay, when they know there is a high-quality Jewish high school in town, he said.

"Jewish professionals can now settle in the city." ■

Ron Prosor: envoy walks UN halls 'tall and proud'

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Ron Prosor serves as Israel's ambassador to the United Nations. Before that, he was Israel's ambassador to the United Kingdom. Earlier this month, he was in Toronto as a guest of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to provide briefings to Jewish community leaders as well as members of the media. He sat down to talk to The CJN.

Ron Prosor defending Israel at the UN

Your colleague, the Israeli ambassador to the United States, Ron Dermer, is credited with helping arrange Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's recent address to the U.S. Congress. Did you have a role to play in that?

I'd like to focus on the fact that the important thing is what Prime Minister Netanyahu said about the Iranian issue. Let's zoom out for a second. What do you see? Today, Iran without nuclear weapons is taking over Yemen, through the Houthis. They are in Iraq, in Syria and in Lebanon.

The regime in Tehran is helping Syrian President Bashar Assad, the only ophthalmologist that I know who is cutting the vision of his people every day.

We see Iran, without nuclear weapons, conducting terror. We see Iran's record on human rights – hanging gays, stoning women – an appalling record on human rights. If you see their behaviour without nuclear weapons and a delivery system, just think how it will affect the whole region with nuclear weapons.

It's not just a problem for Israel. Countries like Saudi Arabia, Egypt and others in the region clearly want to defend themselves. It's going to change the whole strategic environment in the Middle East.

They control the Strait of Hormuz and Bab-el-Mandeb [two choke points through which Middle Eastern oil flows to world markets], so it is absolutely important that the issue of Iran is on the table.

What has been the fallout from Netanyahu's speech?

It's not just Israel. Other countries are affected. You see a bit of it coming out in the Arab world, which is important.

Al Arabiya, the Saudi newspaper, came out with the stance to listen to what Israel is saying about the situation. Under the radar, in the Gulf, they're worried. You can understand their worries. They're on the front line.

The idea of focusing only on Israel's concerns is very narrow. The Arab world is quite united about a nuclear Iran.

Iran is radical Islam with a connection to nuclear weapons. It's a huge threat to world peace.

You recently sent a letter to the United Nations with Israel's concerns about Iran's role in arming Hamas and Hezbollah. Do you expect that to lead to anything?

Iran is not just sending weapons, missiles and money. Iran is arming Hezbollah. An Iranian general was found strolling near the Israeli-Syrian border.

Iran has created with Hezbollah a situation that Hezbollah has nearly 100,000 rockets, more than most NATO powers.

They give money to Assad and money and missiles to Hezbollah. Hezbollah is actively involved with Assad in butchering his own population.

Hamas has been testing rockets lately, shooting them into the Mediterranean Sea, so they are re-arming and trying to put longer ranges on those missiles.

They are taking cement that is supposed to be used for hospitals and schools and using it to rebuild terror tunnels.

We see repetition every day of the leaders speaking of the liquidation of Israel.

There was an operation in Gaza, Operation Protective Edge, and the idea was to stop missiles launched against Israeli civilians.

Hamas agreed to reconstruct Gaza. They're using the money, the cement, to build tunnels and reinvigorate the rockets.

We tell the UN so in the future they won't say they didn't know. The same thing in the north. That's crucial. Under UN Resolution 1701, you have UNIFIL to make sure Hezbollah does not introduce new weapons in the buffer zone. And we see them breaking those agreements every day.

The UN is about to receive a report about last summer's war with Hamas. Will the departure of commission chair William Schabas, who resigned after it was revealed he had given a legal opinion to the PLO, make a difference to the report's findings? Do you expect it to be fair to Israel?

> Instead of pointing fingers, the world should embrace us, give us a hug, because we are on the front lines.

We have a situation where Israel from the start said this chairman, this committee, is biased. The former chairman is on the record saying his dream is to have [former Israeli prime minister and president] Shimon Peres and Bibi Netanyahu come to the International Criminal Court in the Hague.

He resigned because it's obvious he's on the payroll of the PLO. It means the whole process from Israel's point of view is flawed.

We feel the commission of inquiry should be revoked.

U.S. officials say that under the current administration, the number of anti-Israel resolutions at the UN have gone down. Can you comment?

The United States, every day, stands with Israel in a different part of the UN, the Security Council, committees.

There is a triple standard versus Israel. There's one standard for democracies, another for dictatorships and another for Israel. The UN Human Rights Council has Saudi Arabia, Cuba and Qatar on it. It's like having Jack the Ripper run Scotland Yard.

The council's permanent agenda item 4 deals with human rights violations all over the world, and there's a special agenda item, No. 7, for every meeting that singles out Israel, the only country in the world singled out.

How difficult is it for you on a personal level to deal with this constant attack?

I walk the corridors of the UN tall and proud, knowing who I represent. Israel has nothing to be ashamed of.

Part of my strategy is to present what Israel is all about, apart from the conflict, such as sustainable development. I've introduced resolutions on entrepreneurship for development. One hundred and forty one countries raised their hands for an Israeli resolution, while the Arabs did everything they could to fight this resolution. It's part of their delegitimization and demonization of Israel.

But representatives of African countries said that while they don't agree with Israel politically, they said that what Israel is doing is absolutely amazing.

Another example, from the cultural side, was bringing in Rita, an Israeli diva, to sing in Farsi and Hebrew two years ago. One hundred and twenty-two countries were in the General Assembly hall, including the Secretary General, who opened the event.

Has all this made a difference at the UN?

At the UN, it's like Economics 101 with a demand and supply curves and the equilibrium. In the UN there's a demand for demonization of Israel but there's also demand for Israeli know-how. We're trying to introduce that, to get to the point of equilibrium.

You often appear on campuses to speak to Jewish students How can Jewish students stand up to the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement and pro-Palestinian groups?

There is not a campus from Cardiff to Edinburgh where I was not received by denunciations on the outside and hecklers inside. At the University of Edinburgh, someone ran at me.

I speak truth to people who one day will be future leaders. I tell them that on the Israeli Supreme Court we have an Israeli Arab. We have ambassadors around the world who are Arab and Druze. That women are in the judiciary. That all the banks today are headed by women.

Israel is a flourishing democracy.

Some don't know this. For some, it doesn't make a difference. From my point of view, success is having someone who listens to you, who question their positions, who asks more questions, and who questions their own suppositions.

Do you think people are coming to appreciate the kinds of challenges Israel is facing?

Israel is on the front line encountering phenomena that western democracies have yet to encounter.

We are trying to defend our citizens on the one hand and not go overboard on the other. Twenty-five years ago, we checked people at airports. People said it was an invasion of privacy, a violation of human rights.

Instead of pointing fingers, the world should embrace us, give us a hug, because we are on the front lines. ■

What my uncle's 'cause of death' by the Nazis really meant

Backstory

ELI HONIG
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

The 17th day of Adar came out on March 8 this year, and it marked the yahrzeit of my uncle Shlomo (Salomon) Scheinbach's death – or should I say his murder?

Remarkably, the International Tracing Service in Arolsen, Germany, attests to him dying in Auschwitz at 2 p.m. on Feb. 22, 1943, with the cause of death listed as "pleuropneumonia."

As a hidden infant, I didn't know my uncle. My mother, sisters and I had been placed in different safe locales through the efforts of a large extended French family who risked life, limb and torture to save us. And, because I was born on Nov. 4, 1942 – some five months after my father, his siblings and their spouses were arrested in the infamous July 16, 1942 roundup across France – I couldn't know these members of my deported family, all of whom were sent to Auschwitz. My father perished there at 10:55 a.m. on Sept. 23, 1942. The cause of his death was officially recorded as "bilateral pneumonia."

To round up this haunting picture with its implausibly specific details, there was my uncle, Chiel Roth, whose death was registered as occurring at 9:45 a.m. on Oct. 9, 1942, due to "bronchopneumonia."

Finally, there was my Uncle Chanina, my father's brother. Though he had arrived in Auschwitz together with the others, he somehow survived even the death march following the evacuation of the camp ahead of the advancing Soviet army. He arrived in Mauthausen on Feb. 16, 1945 and died there on Feb. 25, 1945 at 7:10 a.m. Cause of death: "sepsis phlegmon on the right upper arm".

The other six members of my immediate family were listed by the International Tracing Service as having arrived at Auschwitz, but there are no records of their death. Presumably, they were dispatched in the gas chambers upon arrival.

I have long wondered about the meticulous death records that I have for my father and three uncles, one of which was recorded in February 1945 when the war's end was clearly visible to most observers, and in particular, to the near vanquished. The almost fanatical "need" of the Nazis to keep such records for those inmates who were not immediately murdered, while at the same time trying to hide even from their own people evidence of their horrendous crimes, is almost incomprehensible. It remains a haunting enigma for me to this day.

Still, when I first confronted what I thought were especially "lame" causes of death in the surreal world of the camp, I naively considered these to be crude euphemisms for masking the deeds of their perpetrators. I suspected that some weeks heart attacks would be the central cause of death, while in others, it would be strokes, or typhus or a host of different things.

Morbid reality set in when I remembered what my mother had relayed to me years before I had obtained such detailed information about my family. I hadn't realized then the full import of what she said. After the war, a survivor of Auschwitz told her that he had witnessed my Uncle Shlomo's death in February of 1943 when he was in a labour detail with a Polish inmate.

It seems that my uncle told the Pole that the Germans were going to "lose the war," and the fellow then reported this to a German officer. My uncle was subsequently brought to a large tub of water and his head was dunked in and held in place until he collapsed. Then he was pulled out, revived, and the process was repeated – dunk, collapse, revive, dunk, collapse, revive – until he was dead.

It is difficult to describe the additional horror I felt when I finally comprehended the macabre, recorded cause of death – "pleuropneumonia." A dictionary definition notes that the "pleural membranes enclose a fluid filled space surrounding the lungs," while pleuropneumonia is "a combined inflammation of the pleura and lungs."

I suspect as well that in their grotesquely imaginative and unfathomably evil minds, the "medical scribes" of the Nazis were fully aware that the term pleuropneumonia also describes an "acute febrile respiratory disorder of cattle." ■

A transgender first, and Kimye circus is headed to Jerusalem

Today she is a man

In what is believed to be a first, a non-denominational Jewish day school in California held a ceremony earlier this month marking a 13-year-old girl's decision to become a boy. Eighth-grader Tom (formerly Mia) Sosnik's ceremony took place before teachers, friends and family in the chapel of the Tehiyah Day School in El Cerrito, near San Francisco. In a speech at the March 13 event, Sosnik said he decided to come out as transgender after the December 2014 suicide of Ohio teen Leelah Alcorn, 17, who left a note saying she felt she had no other choice but to kill herself after her conservative Christian family forced her to undergo conversion therapy. In response to Sosnik's decision, the Tehiyah community has been learning more about gender diversity in partnership with Gender Spectrum, a local group that supports transgender kids and teens.

Vickers gets Wiesenthal award

Former parliamentary sergeant-at-arms Kevin Vickers received a Medal of Valor from the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles March 24 for his role in stopping an armed attacker on Parliament Hill last October. He's credited with shooting the armed gunmen dead, but has consistently downplayed his actions. "I've always said this is not about me, this is about a remarkable security team," he told CTV News. Vickers was appointed Canada's ambassador to Ireland in January.

Kanye and Kim to visit the Holy Land

Hip hop star Kanye West and his reality TV star wife Kim Kardashian are reportedly planning to visit Israel later this month. The celebrity power couple booked rooms at Jerusalem's high-end Waldorf Astoria Hotel for their entourage for April 12, Yediot Achronot reported. The hotel declined to comment. Yediot also reported that everyone involved in the visit has signed a multimillion-dollar confidentiality agreement and an Israeli security firm that specializes in protecting VIPs has been hired. The couple reportedly is visiting Israel before flying to Jordan. ■

Letters to the Editor

The moral of Masada

In response to the letter "Bibi and Masada," (March 26), it's important to clarify that the storytellers of Masada were not "peacemakers," as suggested. They were Jews who hid to escape the mass suicide, but were later taken as slaves to Rome, never again to live another free day. They chose a life of slavery over death. They did not choose peace with their Roman conquerors.

Having just finished reading Josephus Flavius' The Jewish War, I feel it is important to present a more accurate analogy: a two-state solution with Hamastan in the West Bank is akin to the fall of Judea in 73 CE. It will inevitably bring about the fall of modern-day Israel.

When a nation lives without security, there can be no true freedom. Equating Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's declaration regarding the lack of a prospect of a two-state solution with national suicide is especially absurd. The opposite is true. A two-state solution without guarantees for Israel's survival will bring about its destruction.

Two thousand years later, we are still here to tell the story of Masada and the Roman Empire is not. I hope the same will be true in another 2,000 years should a Palestinian state ever be established alongside Israel. My doubts do not make me any less Zionist.

Modelling a Jewish life

Having worked in supplementary Jewish education for almost 40 years, I found the debate about education to be interesting ("How can we ensure the future of Jewish education?" March 19).

What I found lacking in both articles is that neither day nor supplementary schools take place in a vacuum. One of the keys to Jewish identity is what happens at home outside of school hours. The child who comes from a home where Judaism is practised with Shabbat observance in a way that's meaningful for the family, where holidays are celebrated at home and at synagogue, and mitzvot are modelled will have a strong connection to what is being taught and experienced at school. They see meaning in what they're learning. Add a Jewish summer camp, and you have an individual who is connected to Jewish life.

A child who comes from a home where there is little to no Jewish observance will have knowledge, but no examples of Jewish living outside of school. Jewish education needs to help children understand what it means to live a Jewish life all the time, not just at school, and the active participation of the family is essential.

Problems at Baycrest

I have worked with people with dementia and their families and know all too well how vulnerable they and other residents of long-term care homes can be. As a volunteer with an organization that advocates for residents of long-term care homes, I am familiar with the regulations of the Ontario Ministry of Health and their inspections process ("Health inspection finds problems at Baycrest," March 19).

The Ministry of Health required Baycrest, like any other Ontario long-term care home, to implement a plan to protect its residents from abuse, for which there is zero tolerance. Yet Baycrest has not complied, despite an order to do so dating back to August 2014. There is no excuse for this failure. A spokesperson says Baycrest "is equipped to readjust its procedures when shortcomings are brought to its attention." If that is the case, the Jewish community should be hearing forthwith how Baycrest will be ensuring zero tolerance of abuse of our vulnerable elders.

Not truly Orthodox

The Canadian Haggadah Canadienne ("A proudly Canadian Haggadah designed for all Jews," March 5) includes "commentaries from 20 rabbis (and one maharat, the title for ordained female clergy in modern Orthodoxy) from across... the denominational spectrum."

Modern Orthodoxy does not ordain women, nor would its members ever publish a Haggadah with input from clergy across the denominational spectrum. This movement, which calls itself "Open Orthodoxy" is open to practices that are not shared by mainstream Orthodoxy. Their Orthodoxy thus remains an open question.

RABBI-2-RABBI

There is no perfect Haggadah

Each Jew experiences the movement to redemption in a different way, and the best versions of the classic text force us to read deeply and connect an ancient message to life today

RABBI ADAM CUTLER
BETH TZEDEC CONGREGATION, TORONTO

RABBI ADAM SCHEIER
CONGREGATION SHAAR HASHOMAYIM, MONTREAL

Rabbi Cutler: As an undergraduate at the University of Toronto, one week prior to Pesach I would bring the largest backpack I owned to Robarts Library where I would check out dozens of Haggadot to be used at my family's seders. Later, as a student at the Jewish Theological Seminary, I would do the same.

The Haggadah is almost certainly the Jewish book with the highest number of editions and commentaries. History provides beautiful illuminated Haggadot, feminist Haggadot and vegetarian Haggadot among many others, all focusing in their own way on the theme of redemption.

This year, we are blessed with the new Canadian Haggadah Canadienne, of which you are an author. Amid the crowded marketplace of Haggadot, why did you feel the need to produce another? What themes in the Haggadah particularly resonate with you? Do you ever notice a tension between one Haggadah and the next?

Rabbi Scheier: Like you, I love Haggadot. But at no point have I said, "Ah, I found the Haggadah that's perfect for me!" I believe that's because there is no Haggadah that is a perfect fit for everyone. Rather, Passover is the ultimate personalized experience. The objective is for each Jew to feel intimately connected with the experience of slavery and freedom.

In editing the Canadian Haggadah Canadienne, I did not endeavour to produce the ultimate Haggadah. Rather, I sought to connect with a part of me that I hadn't yet found in any other Haggadah: the experience of living in Canada and possessing a strong Canadian identity.

Rabbi Cutler: I opened my email this morning to discover a notice that Sefaria, a free online portal that bills itself as "a living library of Jewish texts," has just published a Haggadah complete with newly translated classical commentaries. It seems that the Haggadah itself is finding freedom from the printed page and moving into an interconnected space that will allow it to grow in perpetuity.

As you have alluded, there can never be a perfect Haggadah, as each of us experiences the movement to redemption in a different way. Of course, I do have my favourites, which tend toward the academic. I love reading how what we now view as the standard text developed over time and in different places.

And I'm equally excited when a comment in a Haggadah that I tend not to use on seder night excites someone else around the table. Ultimately, a great Haggadah is one that forces the reader to stop "davening" the Haggadah, to read it deeply, to engage with the words and to connect it to life today.

Rabbi Scheier: For me, the highlight of publishing a Haggadah has been seeing how it has been received and interpreted. I was so moved by how many who read it have found a piece of their own personal or family experience in the book. I hope that many others will continue to have this reaction.

Ultimately, our hope for the Haggadah is that it will engage people in the Jewish ritual of the Passover seder. Perhaps, by feeling that there is a Haggadah that speaks to a certain part of their identity and needs, some in our Canadian Jewish community might feel more connected to their tradition.

I have always seen the Passover seder as an opportunity for engagement. As a child, I recall it as the most engaged experience with Jewish ritual. I remember the thrill of searching for the afikoman, the excitement of being a young child allowed to stay up late, at the adults' table. I can still feel the bated-breath anticipation that all of the children had as we waited for the pinnacle of our seder experience: the friendly competition we held at the end, in which each child competed with my grandfather (and each other) in who could hold the final note of Chad Gadya the longest (the winner won bragging rights until next year's seder).

Writing the Canadian Haggadah Canadienne was a years-long process of challenges, successes and discovery. Ultimately, I think the project's success will be measured by its ability to inspire the conversations that, like those I recall around my grandparents' table, stay with the seder participants long after the afikoman is consumed. ■

A commitment to the traditions of Judaism

In this week's CJN, we profile 24 people who are making their mark in the Canadian Jewish community. On the surface, they don't seem to share much in common: some live in Toronto, others in Montreal. Some work directly in the Jewish community, while others are applying Jewish values beyond the borders of Canadian Jewry. A few are outwardly religious, others not so much. There are experts who have already established themselves in their respective fields and young upstarts just beginning to hit their stride.

There's Yehuda Azoulay, who is on a mission to bring Sephardi culture to mainstream Judaism, and Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold, at the forefront of the women's leadership movement in Orthodox Judaism. There's Risa Alyson Cooper and Stephan Ouaknine, each in their own unique way fusing Judaism and environmentalism. There's Sara Angel, who has worked tirelessly to recover Nazi-looted artwork, and Tamara Kramer, who's bringing the shtetl to your radio. And there are artists such as Eli Batalion, one half of the YidLife Crisis duo, and Zev Moses, who helms the Interactive Jewish Museum of Montreal, both of whom are bringing Jewish culture to entirely new creative platforms.

What unites them all is a commitment to the traditions of Judaism and to exploring new ways to express those traditions. And there's no better time of year to showcase their achievements than Pesach, when we honour our first steps as a nation and consider the next steps to come. Our future and our past are inextricably linked – that's the prevailing theme of the Passover seder, and what ultimately connects these 24 trailblazers.

And speaking of the future and new ideas, last week's cover story exploring shrinking enrolment at Jewish high schools across the country (with the notable exception of Vancouver's King David High School) underlined the need for creative vision to ensure the future of Jewish education. We know you have your own ideas about what schools, community institutions and individuals must do to strengthen Jewish schools – and we want to hear from you. Send your ideas to cjninfo@gmail.com, and we'll publish the best ones in a future edition.

This Passover edition marks the first anniversary of the new CJN. Looking back on the last 12 months, I think we have a lot to be proud of. Clearly I'm not alone.

Last week, The CJN took home a major honour at the 2015 Canadian Community Newspaper Awards. We were named the top overall publication in the highest circulation category. It's a testament to the gargantuan effort that goes into assembling these pages every week.

From the reporters and editors who bring you the best stories and commentary in our community to the designers and production staff responsible for packaging those words with compelling imagery – not to mention our advertising and marketing departments, who are out in the community strengthening our brand, and the accounting and office staff that help keep everything running smoothly – The CJN is blessed with a uniquely talented staff.

I want to take this opportunity to thank you all. I hope this award will be the first of many in recognition of your incredible work.

SPEECH

'The award I always coveted was the Cy Young': Mordecai Richler

Jacob Richler

On March 12, 2015, Mordecai Richler was named an honorary citizen of Montreal, and the public library on Park Avenue renamed Bibliothèque Mordecai-Richler.

The following is excerpted from a speech delivered by his son at the dedication ceremony.

Just last month in the Globe and Mail I came across yet another story about how my father was unlikely to ever be honoured by the City of Montreal. And I got to thinking about that gazebo on the mountain, and what my father would have made of it. More particularly, if he would have wanted it at all. The line of thinking unexpectedly brought me back to a fall night in 1997, at the Four Seasons Hotel in Toronto, where my father had just won the Giller Prize for his novel Barney's Version – and with it, collected a $25,000 cheque from his old friend from Baron Bing High School, Jack Rabinovitch.

Upon taking the microphone Dad changed the topic to a preferred subject – professional sports. "Thank you," he said. "But the award I always coveted was the Cy Young."

This got me thinking. Maybe the sundry initiatives to honour him were in fact on the wrong track. And the best thing to do to get Montreal city council out of its self-created bind was for me to ring up my old high school friend from Westmount, Geoff Molson, and see if just possibly his Montreal Canadiens might step in instead. What I was picturing was my father's favourite old cardigan hanging from the rafters of the Bell Centre with the retired sweaters of the rest of Nos Glorieux – ideally, right alongside the one belonging to Jean Beliveau, who my Dad so enjoyed rooming with on his last salmon fishing trip to Newfoundland.

Admittedly this seemed like a long shot. So I returned to considering the proposals already fielded

One imaginative citizen suggested putting my father's name on the Metro station that now bears that of the Abbé Lionel Groulx. There was poetic justice to the suggestion. But it didn't feel quite right. The problem being that my father had never once set foot on the Metro, and didn't know what it was all about.

By which I don't mean to suggest he was not resourceful when it came to Montreal transit: for example, I distinctly remember him once faking a bad limp while hailing a taxi, because it was bitterly cold out and he didn't want to be declined for the fare from our downtown apartment to the Montreal Press Club, just three blocks away.

Anyway, the suggestion of street name seemed more appropriate. And if it was politically difficult, I thought that I had a solution, plucked straight out of Montreal history. My late friend, the long time city councillor Nick Auf der Maur once explained to me that the reason we have a downtown street with bizarre name of City Councillors was to combat a situation at city hall whereby councillors kept negotiating secret agreements to name streets after each other. Rue City Councillors was the truce – a street named for all of them, to put a stop to the re-naming frenzy once and for all.

So why not a rue Anglo Novelists? Everyone would understand that it was named for my dad, without it explicitly saying so. The English letters on his sign would be twice the size as the French ones. And as an added bonus, if in the future Montreal were to ever again be inconvenienced with another brilliant English novelist of the politically meddlesome sort, no awkward posthumous recognition would be required, for it would already be in place.

Jacob Richler with his mother Florence in the Mordechai Richler Reading Room at Concordia University in 2013.
JANICE ARNOLD PHOTO

It might have worked – but it was a bit of a clunker. So I am profoundly grateful that at that point Mayor [Denis] Coderre finally entered the fray with a far more elegant and appropriate solution.

A library. In Mile End.

It's perfect. And the fact that it's located in a former Anglican church somehow makes it just a little more so.

This is a great honour for all of us Richlers – and I thank you especially on my mother's behalf, Mayor Coderre, for seeing this through in her lifetime. I also want to single out Counc. Marvin Rotrand for his efforts advancing the file

And before leaving I want to acknowledge something else. Many people are against this, and since the day my father died – if not before – been vigorously and vocally opposed to this city honouring him in any way at all. Some such people even sit on council. And to all of them I want to say one thing.

Make no mistake, my father loved this city – foibles and all. Maybe foibles especially. Admittedly, places without flaws and conflict are not much fun to write about. But writing about this city kept him happily busy for decades. Not just here, but abroad. And it was his desire and commitment to getting Montreal exactly right in his fiction that forced him to return his family here after two happy decades in London – another fine city, with quite a lot going on that's worth writing about.

He wrote about this place and shone a spotlight on its flaws precisely because he loved it. He preferred dialogue and impertinent questions to silent assumptions, and thought exposing and discussing painful truths was always better than letting them simmer silently, fomenting prejudice and hatred. In closing I will respectfully suggest that anyone who doesn't understand all of that has never cared about anything with anything close to the passion or intelligence that my father always brought to the table.

But if you count yourself in that unfortunate number don't despair. A solution is at hand. All you need to do is to get yourself a membership card to the Bibliothèque Mordecai-Richler.

Borrow some good books. Read them. Ask questions. Find answers. Share them. And please, pay your late fees. ■

These 24 Jews are changing the world as we know it

Change may be inevitable, but it's not easy. It requires vision, inspiration and bravery to make it happen. Over the past few months, we here at The CJN have been thinking a lot about change in the Jewish community and how it affects where Canadian Jewry is headed in the future. And that's what prompted us to take a closer look at some of the young innovators taking our religion, and our community, in bold new directions.

The 24 visionaries profiled in this week's edition are re-examining age-old understandings of Judaism, with an eye to furthering our tradition in ways some of us probably hadn't even considered before. And in their enthusiasm, their passion – even their audacity – for a Jewish future, we find hope and excitement. If they can find a way to move Judaism forward, perhaps all of us can in our own unique ways.

MELISSA SHIFF

Artist focuses on Jewish culture and ritual

Melissa Shiff, a Toronto-based video, performance and installation artist, said she chooses to focus her work on Jewish culture, memory and ritual because "memory is the means that preserves Jewish culture."

Shiff, 48, a research associate at York University's Sensorium: Centre for Digital Arts and Technology, said her decision to present Jewish themes through her art came out of an art school class she took called "Representing the Jew as Other."

"As an emerging artist, it struck me that I had a responsibility to add my voice and perspective to this history of representation," she said.

"What interested me was rather how identity is constructed and, for this reason, I began to make work about ritual and how this constitutes, along with cultural memory, an important method of identity construction."

Some of her projects include a performance art piece called Times Square Seder: Featuring The Matzo Ball Soup Kitchen, and another was an installation called The Medium is the Matzo.

But for the past three years, Shiff has been the lead artist on Mapping Ararat: An Imaginary Jewish Homelands Project.

"With Mapping Ararat, we are using the new technology of augmented reality to image and imagine what Mordecai Noah's 1825 plan to turn Grand Island, N.Y., into a Jewish homeland might have looked like," she explained.

"With the latest geo-spatial technology, one can now place virtual architecture anywhere on the globe, and visitors can see this virtual architecture on their smartphones or tablets with the precise GPS co-ordinates."

Shiff said she's working on a film that will show the walking tour and hopes to circulate it at film festivals. ■

ZEV MOSES

Curating a virtual Jewish museum

When Zev Moses founded the Interactive Jewish Museum of Montreal in 2010 his goal was to develop a Jewish museum unlike any other: one that would be "community-driven and participatory."

Executive director Moses, now 31, wanted to present the city's Jewish past in a way that would appeal, especially, to younger, tech-savvy people – Jews and non-Jews. Its major funding is from Federation CJA's Generations Fund and the Jewish community of Montreal as well as private foundations and individuals.

The museum is virtual (imjm.ca) and accessible on the Internet. The goal was to use archival material available in innovative ways, as well as do original research. The Museum of Jewish Montreal (MJM), as it is known today, has gone a long way to accomplish that.

One of its first projects, to "map" historic Jewish sites in Montreal, remains popular. The interactive map allows visitors to select a location and get tidbits of information, be it a famous writer's home, an iconic business or a long-gone community institution.

Coming this year are stories and photos on Jewish Montreal contributed by the public, to be shared electronically via an easy-to-use web tool and preserved.

"Much of the information that relates to Jewish life in Montreal has been passed down from generation to generation through photographs and storytelling," he said. "But most of them have never been recorded and therefore are at risk of being lost forever."

More recently, MJM has been emerging into the physical world. It has organized "pop-up" exhibitions: last year, a simulated 1930s clothing sweatshop and this year one on cantor/crooner Samy Elmaghribi. In summer, MJM's student interns lead walking tours of the old Jewish neighbourhoods. ■

A compelling look at Lincoln and the Jews

Gil Troy

A classic Jewish joke describes aspiring zoologists writing term papers about elephants. The French student writes about the elephant's love life, the Canadian writes about elephants being so nice, and the Jew writes about "The Elephant and the Jewish Problem."

I thought of this gibe, satirizing Jews' gloomy self-involvement, when reading Lincoln and the Jews: A History, especially with a Canadian audience in mind. But this magnificent volume's magic comes from the way the two co-authors, Prof. Jonathan Sarna and Benjamin Shapell, use the story of "Rabbi Abraham" and his Jewish countrymen to illuminate 19th-century history, teaching about the growing American Jewish community, about the United States during the Civil War, and about the unique bond between Jews and non-Jews in North America, the greatest, most welcoming, most Jew-friendly landmass of freedom outside of Israel ever.

The work comes alive thanks to extraordinary primary sources, especially handwritten documents, many of which Shapell has lovingly collected over the decades for the Shapell Manuscript Collection, and has graciously exhibited widely. We who love history not only appreciate the power of yesterday's ideas but the texture of the past, which is rendered powerfully here thanks to dozens of colour photographs allowing readers to revel in these living links to history, to our story.

The Lincoln who emerges in this beautifully written and beautifully produced work is a mensch. Consider this defining exchange with the Canadian mystic and Christian Zionist, Henry Wentworth Monk, whose wild, bearded, Old Testament look captured Father Abraham's attention – and yes, Lincoln enjoyed his first name's biblical power. On discovering that his messianic visitor hailed from Ontario, Lincoln asked what Canadians thought of the Emancipation Proclamation freeing the slaves – demonstrating a respect for America's northern neighbour Canadians still crave. Monk complimented the president, then proposed following up with the more "urgent.... emancipation of the Jew."

Thinking of his growing circle of Jewish friends and acquaintances, whom the authors have catalogued diligently, Lincoln was surprised, asking "Are they not free already?" Jews were free in America, but not in Europe, Monk said, expressing his hope the civilized world would "atone for what they have done to the Jews – for their 2,000 years of persecution – by restoring them to their national home in Palestine."

Lincoln, in words that remain true today and bear repeating in the Age of the ever more bitter Bibi-Barack battle, said, "That is a noble dream, Mr. Monk, and one shared by many Americans. I myself have a regard for the Jews. My chiropodist is a Jew, and he has so many times 'put me on my feet' that I would have no objection to giving his countrymen 'a leg up.'"

This short, spontaneous, interaction – blessed with Canadian content – shows Lincoln's wit, humanity, and generosity. Even ardent anti-slavery abolitionists such as William Lloyd Garrison could be horrifically anti-Semitic, calling Jews "descendant[s] of the monsters who nailed Jesus to the cross."

The exchange reveals Lincoln's proto-Zionism and testifies to the increasingly casual contact he – and millions of other Americans – had with Jews, as the North American community flourished.

Jewish history most honours Lincoln for overriding Ulysses S. Grant's anti-Semitic order expelling Jewish peddlers from conquered territory. This book shows that Lincoln's gift to the Jews was not only to protect them when harassed, but to accept them in everyday life

The great historian Sarna is a friend, while the publisher Thomas Dunne is publishing my next book. But these connections should not prevent me from saluting a work that teaches so much, in the most compelling and entertaining way, about who we once were, as a fledgling, more insecure community, and who we can be, thanks to the "noble dreams" of North America – and of Israel – realized by Lincoln and other heroes. ■

Bring the ushpizettes to your seder

Sara Horowitz

Maybe it was the Purim drinking that got me shuffling my holiday traditions, but this year I found myself thinking about developing a tradition of ushpizin – or, more specifically, ushpizettes – for Pesach

Ushpizettes is a word of my own coinage. Ushpizin, of course, is the Aramaic word for guests, and what do we invite guests to do but to come zetz – sit (Yiddish, not Aramaic) – around our table. The Sukkot ushpizin are the seven biblical guests symbolically invited to share our sukkah on successive evenings of the autumn festival: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Aaron, Joseph and David. Many people have added to this list of spiritual visitors the names of seven women, also invited to the sukkhah.

With the freedom that comes from developing a new practice, the list can vary – sometimes including biblical figures, sometimes prophetesses, sometimes historical or contemporary figures. I call these women, a bit flippantly, I confess, the ushpizettes.

I imagine them as hybrid – part yiddishkeit, part rhythm and blues backup, part revivalist, part trail blazer. Think Miriam, Deborah, your bubbie, Rebbetzin Esther Jungreis, Rosie the Riveter and Diana Ross, rolled into one. They remedy the male exclusivity of the traditional ushpizin ritual. And they honour retroactively women like my bubbie, who cooked lavishly for the festival in a tiny kitchen, then schlepped the food down flights of stairs to the collective sukkah erected in the courtyard of her Brooklyn apartment building, where she served her husband and sons, but did not sit and dine with them.

But perhaps, I found myself thinking, we were focused on the wrong festival. If ever a holiday called for the spiritual presence of women guests, it is Pesach. There is, on the one hand, the unremitting maleness of the Haggadah narrative – the account of the coming into nationhood of our Israelite ancestors told with references to male agents, and the remembrance of the male rabbis who elaborated the story and codified the seder practice.

And how many of us still possess Haggadot that refer to the "master of the house" leading the seder. On the other hand, there is the long history of women's labour, so fundamental to holiday preparations, and the biblical backstory – missing from the Haggadah liturgy – of women's crucial role in resistance and redemption. And yet, the traditional seder ritual – the one most of us grew up with – passes over the place of women.

So let's bring the ushpizettes to the seder. Although the ushpizin ritual is traditionally linked with Sukkot and not Pesach, it fits in so perfectly with the themes and practices of the spring festival. The seder begins, after all, with a general call out to those needing a place at the table, offering to take them in. And midway through the evening, we welcome the prophet Elijah to share a l'chaim with us. Some of us already welcome the prophetess Miriam, as well. So developing a tradition of ushpizettes for Pesach seems like a natural progression.

I envision the Pesach ushpizettes less as a liturgical list to invoke, and more as a substantive presence to evoke. There are, after all, only one or two nights of seders each year (depending on one's geography, denomination or personal practice). The invitees can vary from year to year, evoked through storytelling, text study, singing or recitation.

I imagine the women of the Exodus, brought to life through their presence in midrash. Or a historical figure – Glückel of Hameln, the astonishing businesswoman and diarist, for example, available to us through her journals, written in Yiddish and translated into English. Or perhaps a poet, like Marge Piercy, whose cycle of seder poems focus on the elements of the seder plate and give them both transcendent and contemporary meaning. Or perhaps a guest more personally connected – the mother or grandmother linked to our first seder memories – whose voice, labour and spirit infuses our own links with Judaism and with the divine. ■

Justin Trudeau's skewed vision of liberty

Michael Taube

Another day, another dollar, another political misstep by Justin Trudeau.

It's reached the point where I can almost set my watch to the Liberal leader either going off script, badly misreading public opinion or putting his foot in his mouth. (As Paul Tuns, The Interim's editor-in-chief and author of an upcoming book on Trudeau, nicely put it, "I want [to] thank Junior for being both a joy and pain to delve into.")

In this case, it was Trudeau's recent speech to the McGill Institute for the Study of Canada that raised many eyebrows.

Trudeau's strategy was to create an "us vs. them" scenario with the Tories. For example, he claimed Prime Minister Stephen Harper's approach "to politics might work in the short term, but it is corrosive over time, especially in a diverse country like Canada. It stokes anxiety and foments fear. Instead of encouraging Canadians to fight for one another's liberty, it tells us to be suspicious of each other's choices."

These lines, which contain many inaccuracies, can be easily written off as political rhetoric. All parties engage in these tactics. It's part of the game we play. We're used to it.

Here's where things started to go downhill, however. Trudeau correctly mentioned that former prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King had set up Japanese internment camps during World War II "because they were popular… despite evidence from the RCMP and defence that they were unwarranted."

Then, he made this statement: "So we should all shudder to hear the same rhetoric that led to a 'none is too many' immigration policy toward Jews in the '30s and '40s, being used to raise fears against Muslims today."

Hold on. Did Trudeau juxtapose the Harper Tories' relationship with the Muslim community with the King Liberals' horrendous handling of Jewish immigration during the rise of Germany's Nazi party?

I'm sorry, but that's nuts!

First, there's a huge difference between Islam and Islamism.

The Tories strongly oppose the brutal, violent actions of Islamists, or Muslim extremists. There has never – repeat, never – been any opposition to the vast majority of moderate Muslims, who are peaceful, hardworking and benefit our society. We want to work with them, not against them.

Second, Trudeau's statement is clearly linked to the controversy involving Muslim women wearing niqabs and whether they should briefly remove them when taking our citizenship oath.

I believe they should. It would ensure that their full facial features are properly viewed for identification purposes. It's not an attack on their religious faith: they're free to wear a niqab in Canada. Rather, it's a small, insignificant way to maintain a degree of safety and security in our country.

Third, Trudeau has a severely skewed vision of what liberty means.

Canadian conservatives strongly believe in the important principles of liberty, democracy and freedom. Our liberties remain as strong as they were when the Tories were first elected in 2006.

The difference is our world is far less safe. The Tory government has to deal with the constant threat of terrorism, both at home (Ottawa shootings) and abroad (ISIS, Al Qaeda, Boko Haram). By making tiny adjustments to personal freedom and liberty, the government has increased the overall freedom and liberty that all Canadians share.

Hence, Trudeau's decision to weave the niqab controversy with King's openly racist policy on Jewish immigration was disgraceful. Combining it with an imaginary Tory campaign against the entire Muslim community was beyond the pale.

Here's some final food for thought.

A recent Global News/Ipsos Reid poll showed 88 per cent of respondents strongly or somewhat supported the "requirement that people show their faces during Canadian citizenship ceremonies." Meanwhile, 72 per cent strongly or somewhat agreed with the PM's position that niqabs and burkas are "symbols of oppression rooted in a culture that is anti-women."

Looks like the people have spoken. Care to comment, Justin? ■ Michael Taube is a Washington Times columnist, and a former speechwriter for Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

After the election

Harold M. Waller

Observers and participants alike were surprised, and in some cases dismayed, by the outcome of the Israeli election. Many were confident that, based on numerous polls, the Zionist Union would emerge victorious and form the government.

What many overlooked, however, was past experience showing that the electorate is very volatile and vote preferences can change to a significant degree in a very short period of time. Furthermore, the electoral system can amplify the effect of relatively small changes in voter intention on the Knesset seat count.

As it turned out, there were significant shifts during the last few days of the campaign, after the last polls had been published. These shifts resulted in the two leading lists gaining votes at the expense of smaller parties (Likud primarily from the right and Zionist Union primarily from the centre). Likud, in particular, benefited from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's call to right of centre voters to vote Likud, even if they preferred another party on the ground, because such strategic voting would ensure that he rather than Labor's Isaac Herzog would be asked to form the government.

From the beginning of the campaign, it was widely accepted that this election was about broad socio-economic issues rather than the usual security, territorial and Palestinian questions. But by election day, at least some voters reverted to the more customary position that Israel is under threat and requires firm leadership.

The duo of Herzog and Tzipi Livni was not perceived as being capable of providing that kind of leadership. Moreover, despite a willingness in many sectors of the population to compromise for the sake of peace, there is considerable skepticism about Palestinian intentions and therefore a reluctance to undertake risks for what might well prove to be a chimerical peace. Last year's war with Hamas and current hostility from Ramallah do affect perceptions about peace prospects.

Another factor was the unprecedented involvement of foreign interests, both European and American, in the election campaign. Using the services of election professionals from abroad and raising money from foreign donors are not exactly innovations in Israeli electoral politics. But the scope and intensity of this year's efforts, especially those perceived as being associated with the interests of the Obama administration, were so large that voters could hardly ignore them. If U.S. President Barack Obama, who is rather unpopular in Israel, was so strongly antagonistic toward Netanyahu, would that not induce some voters to vote Likud to spite the president?

One of the by-products of the election was the rather nasty crisis in U.S.-Israel relations, purportedly caused by some unwise and unfortunate comments by Netanyahu. However, the intensity of the animosity emanating from the White House and certain media sources makes one wonder if the president was looking for a pretext to further distance his administration from Israel. It is hardly a secret that Obama eagerly anticipated a Zionist Union victory. Regardless of the merits of the two leaders' respective positions, the evident ill will requires substantial compensatory efforts by both sides.

Moreover, as the dispute intensifies, the American Jewish community is put on the spot. Divisions within the community over Israel's policies and U.S.-Israel relations have been a troubling feature of the last several years. These problems antedate the Obama period, but have been exacerbated since he took office. The community's leadership is just as likely as Israel's government to find navigating these rough waters to be a treacherous challenge.

The election outcome should enable the prime minister to form a government without too much difficulty. Moreover, the dominant position of Likud in the anticipated coalition might well make governing easier over the next few years. However, managing the relationship with the United States during the waning years of the Obama presidency is likely to prove a greater challenge to Netanyahu. ■

Jewish advocacy groups testify in support of Bill C-51

jshupac@thecjn.ca

The heads of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), B'nai Brith Canada and the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) all travelled to Ottawa last week to testify in support of the federal government's controversial new anti-terror law, Bill C-51.

Between March 24 and 26, David Cape, chair of CIJA; B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn, plus B'nai Brith's national legal counsel Marvin Kurz and honorary counsel David Matas; and Simon Wiesenthal CEO Avi Benlolo presented individual statements before the House of Commons standing committee on public safety and national security, which is reviewing the bill.

Critics say C-51 gives too much power without sufficient oversight to Canada's spy agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), which would be given the ability to disrupt threats instead of just informing police about them.

In addition, they say the bill would threaten free speech by making it a crime to advocate or promote terrorism, and would allows federal agencies to share information about potential threats. They also say it raises concerns about privacy and could lead to protest groups being targeted for actions and statements that have little to do with terrorism.

But although their arguments in favour of the legislation weren't identical, all three Jewish groups conveyed the concern that Jewish communities in western democratic societies are increasingly becoming the targets of terror, hate speech and hate crimes, and they argued Bill C-51 would offer viable and legitimate protective measures.

To bolster claims the Jewish community is especially vulnerable, all three statements referenced examples of recent terrorist attacks against Jews, such as the 2012 bombing of a Jewish tour bus in Bulgaria, the 2014 attack on the Jewish Museum in Brussels, this year's attack on a kosher supermarket in Paris and the shooting of a Jewish guard in front of a Copenhagen synagogue.

They cite Al-Shabaab's recent call for attacks against Jewish-owned businesses in North America and the fact that during their trial, it was revealed that two men who were convicted of conspiring to attack Via Rail also had plans to kill "prominent members of Canadian society" and "rich Jews."

"I strongly believe that [Jews] are targeted," Benlolo told The CJN. "We're seeing that a terrorist will ultimately not only seek out a general target, but will seek out the Jewish community."

Here in Canada, he said, "we don't know if a terrorist might attack a Jewish school or institution at any time."

Although all three groups stressed the importance of the bill balancing civil liberties and the right to privacy and free speech with national security, they praised C-51 for its potential to root out terrorist threats.

Martin Sampson, CIJA's director of communications, said that in order to formulate its testimony, CIJA conducted community consultations and invited legal experts to provide insight on the bill.

Respondents' views varied widely, he said, and the resulting statement, which Cape presented March 26, represents "a significant consensus" in support of C-51.

In it, Cape outlines five areas that he said have "particular resonance with the Jewish community." For example, the bill's pledge to empower courts to remove materials promoting terrorism would enable the removal of "vicious materials, often [those] calling for violence against Jews."

Cape acknowledged critics' concerns that this provision could cause "the censorship of odious ideas not directly linked to violence," but he argued that the restriction "strikes an appropriate balance between freedom of speech and rights to life and security."

While supportive of the proposed expansion of CSIS' role to include disruption of potential terrorist attacks, Cape noted, "a concurrent and measured increase in the review of CSIS' activities would be beneficial [to prevent abuses]."

B'nai Brith Canada's submission, presented by Matas and Kurz on March 26, offered both support for the bill and several suggested amendments.

They first raised examples of threats to Jews worldwide, such as the Israeli Counter-Terrorism Bureau's warning last month that "global jihadi elements will likely seek to carry out additional attacks on Jewish and Israeli targets, particularly in western and northern Europe."

The Jewish community understands "the tie between speech and action" they said, and thus, "properly tailored laws that target the promotion of terrorism are both permissible and necessary."

They concluded with recommendations to help the bill avoid "vagueness and overbreadth" and "meet Charter [of Rights and Freedoms] standards." For example, they urged that its prohibition on the promotion of "terrorism offences in general" more clearly define which offences are intended.

CIJA's David Cape, left, with public safety committee chair Daryl Kramp

Benlolo, who spoke before the committee on March 24, outlined the threat to democracy posed by groups such as the Islamic State, Boko Haram, Hezbollah and Hamas.

Benlolo praised C-51's proposal to increase information sharing between federal government agencies, as well as criminalize the promotion of terrorism.

"My concern is that many of those who have opposed this bill simply are not aware of the increasing threat of terrorism and the rising tide of hatred here in Canada, particularly on university campuses," he said.

He emphasized the importance of having "sufficient legal and procedural mechanisms" to ensure that "our rights to privacy, peaceful protest and freedom of expression are in no way diminished." ■

Hot plate fire deaths spur warnings for observant Jews

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

The tragic deaths of seven siblings in a house fire in Brooklyn, N.Y., last month underscores the need for observant Jews to respect the dangers posed by fire, says the rabbi of an Orthodox Toronto synagogue.

Rabbi Yehoshua Weber of Clanton Park Synagogue, said Jews deal with open flames and long-running electrical appliances more than the general population, "so we have to be especially vigilant. We should have smoke alarms that are monitored, and be especially vigilant about it. I see it as a halachic imperative."

Rabbi Weber was commenting a few days after a March 21 house fire in Brooklyn claimed the lives of seven brothers and sisters. Preliminary investigations suggested a faulty hot plate, used to keep food warm during the Sabbath, was to blame.

More than a year ago, in a synagogue bulletin, Rabbi Weber warned his congregation about the dangers of not adequately respecting fire.

In his case, the carbon monoxide detector in his home went off on a Shabbat morning, the third day of a three-day yom tov (holiday).

The house was cleared and no one was hurt. Fire department officials said the alarm went off because of inadequate ventilation.

"The constant burning of the gas range and oven – even on a low flame, will over time emit unhealthy levels of carbon monoxide. I was told that the fire department was tending to many such calls over the last few days. The firemen implored me to please tell the rabbis and announce to the community that if people need to leave on the stove or oven over the holidays, they must ensure that the area is properly ventilated. Turning on an exhaust fan or even opening the kitchen window a bit is enough to prevent terrible danger," he wrote at the time.

In Brooklyn, faulty wiring of a hot plate is believed to have caused the fire. Rabbi Weber said such events, though tragic, are fairly rare. "I don't think it's statistically significant."

According to the Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services, the death rate caused by fire in residential structures was 6.8 per million in 2004 and 4.9 per million in 2013.

Narrowing the data even more, Stephen Welowszky, district chief responsible for public education at Toronto Fire Services, said from 2009 to 2012, there were 12 fatalities in the City of Toronto related to cooking incidents, or 19.4 per cent of all fire-related fatalities. A further 104 people suffered cooking-related injuries.

"Cooking is the No. 1 ignition in civilian fires," Welowszky said.

Jews have been dealing with fire for centuries, Rabbi Weber said. Candles are lit on Shabbat, yom tovim and Chanukah, while stoves are kept running over holidays. "We should not throw out the baby with the bathwater," he said.

Most members of his congregation keep foods warm by running their stoves and ovens on low heats, or on a blech, a covering placed on top of the heating elements. Crockpots are increasingly popular, but Rabbi Weber said hot plates, the culprit in the Brooklyn fire, are not as widely used.

According to Welowszky, "hot plates are generally safe. However, it's the way you use them that can be a hazard. Unattended cooking can be a hazard. We always say that when you're cooking, stay in the kitchen. Cooking should be supervised at all times, especially when there are children in the home."

Welowszky said leaving a stove or element on, even at a low setting, "is always a risk."

He recommended families look into acquiring a Safe-T-Element, which is available in Toronto and substantially reduces the risk of igniting flammable objects.

He also suggested cleaning grease off hot plates after each use and discarding any malfunctioning appliances or those with frayed power cords. And he recommended having working smoke alarms on every level of a home, as well as an escape plan that all members of the family are familiar with. ■

Torontonian leads voting for NCAA's Hobey Baker Award

The University of Michigan's Zach Hyman led the Big Ten in scoring this season with 12 goals and 21 assists.

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

It's too early to plan the celebration and get outfitted for a tux, but with less than three weeks to go, the University of Michigan's Zach Hyman is the leading vote-getter for the prestigious Hobey Baker Award, given annually to the best NCAA Division 1 college hockey player.

As of March 26, Hyman led the final 10 nominees with 12,551 votes, well ahead of Michigan Tech's Tanner Kero's 8,330.

A 22-year-old senior, Hyman is enjoying a breakout season with the Wolverines. He finished the regular season as the Big Ten's leading scorer with 12 goals and 21 assists for 33 points in 20 games. Add out-of-conference points, and he totalled 19 goals and 30 assists, for 49 points. In his three previous seasons, Hyman registered a total of 35 points.

Recognition for the fine season Hyman is enjoying continued to mount last week. The Toronto-born player was named first all-star on the 2014-15 All-Big Ten Hockey Team, as selected by Big Ten coaches and a media voting panel.

Earlier this season, Hyman won a Big Ten Sportsmanship Award, and last year he received the Bates/Deskins Award as the University of Michigan's top junior student athlete, and a Big Ten Distinguished Scholar award.

His good marks are a factor in Hobey Baker voting. A selection panel takes into account scholastic achievement as well as character.

The 27-member selection committee will narrow the 10 finalists to a top three, known as the Hobey Hat Trick, which will be announced on April 2. The winner will be named on April 10 in Boston during the Frozen Four tournament.

The top 10 was chosen by a combination of Division 1 coaches and fan voting. Other finalists include Jack Eichel of Boston University, touted as a top two selection in the NHL entry draft this year, and two-time All-Big Ten defenceman Mike Reilly of Minnesota.

Hyman is a 2010 fifth-round pick (123rd overall) of the Florida Panthers. He is a former student at Robbins Hebrew Academy and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. ■

Temple Emanu-El to raise $6 million through land sale

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Temple Emanu-El, the Reform congregation located in a leafy upscale neighbourhood in north Toronto, is selling off 1.5 acres of prime real estate at the eastern edge of the synagogue property.

The imminent sale of the land, which has been subdivided into three residential lots, is expected to raise $6 million. The funds will go toward an endowment fund that will ensure the synagogue's financial viability for decades to come, said president Pekka Sinervo.

As of late last week, the temple's board of directors had reviewed several offers and had put them before the temple membership, which must agree to the sale, according to the synagogue's bylaws.

If the members accept the board's recommendations, the deal should close in July, Sinervo said.

"The bottom line is that this creates a sustainable financial model for the congregation for the next half century," Sinervo told The CJN. "This is the goal of the board, so we're not worrying about finances, but what to do in our community."

Like other congregations facing an aging membership, synagogue leaders had been concerned about the temple's future financial health. Although the temple has no debt, it was becoming increasingly difficult to balance the budget, Sinervo said.

The infusion of funds and creation of an endowment, whose income stream will lessen the financial burden on current members, will mean the synagogue can renovate and improve the facilities, he said.

The funds will also permit the temple to better reach out to potential new congregants, who will know that the building's finances – and annual fees – are stable and unlikely to balloon, he added.

A little less than 10 per cent of the proceeds of the sale are earmarked for parking lot improvements – a condition imposed by the City of Toronto to approve the deal – while other funds will go towards "a facelift" of the social hall, renovations of washrooms, a new roof and "freshening up" the temple's school.

At one time it was thought the surplus land might be used for subsequent expansion, but the congregation now stands at 330 families, below the maximum 410 permitted by the temple's bylaws.

Sinervo said discussions over disposition of the land began in 1990. The eastern edge of the property was unused, except as a parking lot during the High Holidays, prompting some to call it "the most expensive parking lot in the city," he said.

In 2008, the temple concluded a strategic plan that recommended monetizing the surplus land.

A proposal was placed before city authorities in 2013, and in January 2014, the committee of adjustment approved the proposal, which included the creation of three residential lots. One had access from Vyner Road and two were accessible from Swansdown Drive. All the proposed properties will be at the end of cul-de-sacs.

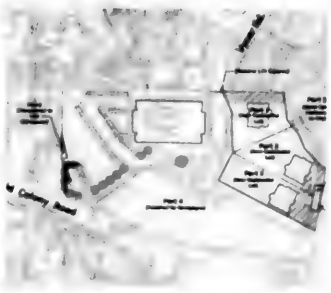
Each is approximately half an acre in size and would see construction of 5,000- to 6,000-square-foot homes, with plenty of land left over for yards or pools, said Sinervo.

The properties were listed for sale on March 10, and on March 24, the temple received multiple offers from builders and individual purchasers.

Sinervo expects all three houses to be completed in about two years.

Temple Emanu-El has been a fixture in the neighbourhood for more than 50 years. Groundbreaking ceremonies for the temple, located on six-and-a-half acres of land at the eastern end of Old Colony Road, took place in 1960, and the first religious services were held in 1963.

In 1969-70, Temple Emanu-El merged with the Beth-El congregation. For a time, the temple also housed Leo Baeck Day School. The congregation prides itself in being a "vibrant, progressive community committed to Jewish renewal at home" and dedicated to tikkun olam, or social justice. ■



Proceeds will go toward an endowment fund that's intended to help ensure the synagogue's viability for years to come.

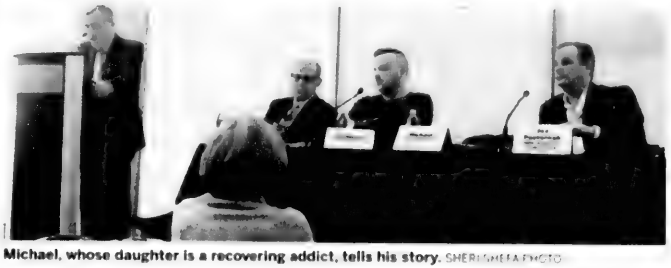
Panel advises parents on handling teen drug use



Michael, whose daughter is a recovering addict, tells his story. SHERI SHEFA PHOTO

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Parents concerned about teen drug and alcohol abuse gathered last week to hear from those affected by addiction and from professionals who work to help people overcome it.

Joe Rich, guest therapist on the television show Cityline, moderated the "Let's Be Blunt" event held at the Lipa Green Centre and introduced Matthew, who shared his story about addiction and his journey to recovery.

Matthew, who was adopted by Jewish parents in Thornhill, said that as a kid, he never felt like he fit in.

He said when his parents agreed to pull him out of Associated Hebrew School in Grade 7 at his urging, he began smoking marijuana with the friends he made at his new school.

By the 11th grade, he was smoking every day, and drinking regularly. By Grade 12, he was selling drugs, too. Eventually, he abused harder drugs such as cocaine.

"When I was about 18 years old, I weighed 115 pounds, and you could play the xylophone on my ribs," Matthew recalled.

"When my father finally confronted me, he asked me if I was doing anything more than smoking marijuana. I lied my tuchus off."

Following another confrontation with his parents that led him to leave home for a few days, he returned home in what he called a "drug-induced psychosis" and told them he needed help.

He found himself at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, where he met Jay Pasternak, an addictions counsellor with JACS (Jewish Addiction Community Services), who encouraged him to try rehab.

He agreed, but not long after he was released, he began drinking and abusing drugs again.

Following some brushes with the law that included being arrested for driving under the influence, he went in and out of rehabilitation programs, but it wasn't until he went to an Alcoholics Anonymous meeting in 2011 that things really turned around for him.

"I remember saying, 'Hi, my name is Matt and I am an addict,' and the only thing I could get out was, 'I really don't like myself anymore,' before I started bawling my eyes out."

When he went outside for a cigarette to collect himself, he was followed by a peer who agreed to sponsor him. He's been clean for the past 3-1/2 years.

Michael, a parent of a recovering addict, also shared his story about his daughter's struggle with addiction.

He said his daughter started to drink when she was 12 years old.

"At that time, I thought it was the beginnings of teenage angst. I was in denial. I didn't believe that Jewish kids did drugs. We don't do that sort of thing. Little did I know," Michael said.

Following a confrontation that led to her storming out of the house in the middle of a frigid December night, she met with her parents days later at a coffee shop, where she was told that she couldn't come back home until she completed a rehab program.

She finished the program, returned home, attended university, volunteered, got a job and has been clean for more than six years.

After Pasternak presented information about some of the more commonly abused drugs and explained what parents should look for if they suspect their teen is abusing them, the panel fielded questions from the audience.

One of the panelists, Michael Waxman, a JF&CS school social worker, said that when it comes talking to kids about drug and alcohol abuse, it's important to keep communication lines open and "not be too punitive," because kids may decide to hide it.

For parents who believe that it's better to allow their minor children to drink at home, rationalizing that it's safer for them to be drinking at home than unsupervised in a park, Waxman said that becomes a slippery slope.

"I always have a hard time when I hear about supervised drinking... If your house is known as the house where it is OK to smoke a joint and have a few beers, then it is the house where it becomes OK to do whatever. As a parent, you don't want that, and if anything, it becomes difficult for the parents to draw a line and say, well, this is OK but that is not." ■

GUEST VOICE

There's light at the end of the addiction tunnel

Lisa Steinberg

Imagine that for your whole life you never felt like you belonged. What would you do?

I was born in 1994 in Toronto. When I was young, my mother left my father because he was extremely abusive. She took care of me as if she had no struggles, and I never questioned anything about it.

I never did well in school, but I was one of the "good" kids. I never got into trouble. I had a very innocent mind. After I graduated middle school, I switched to a local religious day school. In my mind, I thought that going to a different school would let me start over and become someone new. I could be anyone I wanted to be.

In the winter of Grade 9, I became very close with a group of boys and girls. I found out they were getting high occasionally. They said I should get high with them. I was very nervous, but I knew I couldn't back out. If I did, they would think I was a loser. So I got high with them.

It was the first time I felt like I belonged and was accepted. After we did drugs together, I remember they said I was part of the crew now. I truly believed that my life was going to be amazing from that moment onward.

After that, I started getting high on weekends. Soon, my friends would come over and get high at my house while my mother was at work. I started skipping school to get high. My grades started dropping. All I wanted to do was sleep. My life was centred around getting high.

Eventually, my doctor found out and suggested that I go to JACS (Jewish Addiction Community Services). I attended one of their support groups for teens with drug abuse and almost immediately I felt in my gut that I truly belonged, that I was not alone.

When I graduated high school, I didn't know what I wanted to do with my life. So I decided to try to "find myself" through a gap-year program at an all-girls seminary in Israel. I felt that if I could situate myself in a new environment and find religion, all my problems would be solved. Unfortunately, that was not to be the case.

Quickly, alcohol became my new drug. I would drink most nights after classes ended. I began passing out in alleyways and other unsafe locations. I got very depressed and suicidal, and I was told it would be best to come home.

> I would drink most nights after classes ended. I began passing out in alleyways and other unsafe locations. I got very depressed and suicidal.

But once I arrived back in Toronto, I continued with my old patterns.

One night, I drank two bottles of wine and smoked weed. I began vomiting and passing out. I called a taxi to take me home. But since I was intoxicated, the driver felt he could take advantage of me. I finally realized he wasn't taking me home and wouldn't let me out of the car. When the police finally arrived, no one believed the drunk and high teenager. That was one of the last times I got high and drunk.

I decided to go back to JACS, get on my knees and ask for help. It was the best decision I ever made.

Now, I have amazing friends who understand what I am going through and support me through anything. I am studying to become a social worker, so I can help teens just like me. As the saying goes, "there is a light at the end of the tunnel." I am grateful to say that I saw the light and am now able to give back to JACS, because without JACS, who knows where my life would have taken me.

If you or someone you love is struggling with, or affected by, addictions, JACS is there to help. All contact with JACS is private and confidential. Just give us a call at 416-638-0350, and if you are not sure what to say, try starting with, "Hi, I was reading an article about JACS in The CJN." We'll help you with the rest. ■

Record 1,400 people attend CJPAC party

HADLEY HARRACK PHOTOS

SHLOMO KAPUSTIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

While the purpose can be obscured by the hoopla, the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee's (CJPAC) annual Action parties are serious business — especially with Canadians going to the polls this fall.

"It's important for us to get as many people involved in the democratic process during this particular year — volunteering on campaigns, getting involved," said the group's executive director, Mark Waldman.

"But the ultimate is to get people also involved in the party of their choice, getting involved in their local riding association and generally having more awareness."

CJPAC hosted its ninth annual Toronto bash March 26, as a record crowd of 1,400 descended on the waterfront's Sound Academy to reconnect with old friends, meet new ones and shmooze with a who's who of Canadian politicians. In May, the group's Montreal chapter will hold its Action party.

CJPAC's parties highlight a side of politics not showcased on TV or in political science classes: the fun side. Policy statements are verboten. Instead, partygoers enjoy hors d'oeuvres, desserts and an open bar. If attendees had been polled, the night's landslide winner would have been a drink: the "spring sour," a whisky sour variant with Canadian maple syrup and apple cider, garnished with a cinnamon stick.

More than 50 politicians from all parties and all levels of government turned out, including three federal ministers, three provincial ministers and an associate minister, and Toronto Mayor John Tory.

"It's a great opportunity to meet with and network with so many members of the Jewish community and beyond," said Ontario Health Minister Eric Hoskins, a Liberal MPP who represents Toronto's St. Paul's riding, home to a large Jewish population.

Hoskins noted the party's unpretentiousness. "It's a lot better than a lot of the events," he said. "Every MPP that has come here over the years will tell you that it's near the top."

Organizers say the less formal approach removes barriers to political entry for young professionals in the parties' sweet spots.

"Most events where you have politicians, it's more formal and they wouldn't have those opportunities," said Waldman. "And through this they can see how approachable the elected officials are, that they can just walk up to them, talk to them, start a conversation. But hopefully it doesn't stop there. It leads to them getting more involved."

With civic engagement low generally, CJPAC has dedicated "a large amount" of its resources to engaging younger Canadians, he added. "You do see within the political world, it tends to be the young people who are getting involved on campaigns disproportionately," Waldman said. "That's an important demographic."

Event co-chair Nick Kadysh, 28, is one of the group's success stories.

"Back when I was a university student, I started off as a CJPAC fellow," he said, referring to the group's year-long training program. "I wasn't very politically involved, but I sort of began getting involved through CJPAC, at first slightly and then more and more and more. And then through [the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs] I ended up working on Parliament Hill, and then I held a number of political roles, in campaigns and legislatures across the country. And now I'm in the private sector. But throughout, I maintained a relationship with CJPAC."

The party's enviable attendance, he said, reflects its fun vibe, but that's not the whole story. "We are not the only event in the world that is fun," Kadysh said. "I think you need to be at least curious about political engagement in order to want to come."

Part of Action's success, he said, stems from the people of different backgrounds in CJPAC's network. This year's organizing committee had more than 50 members. Among them was Brett Chang, a 23-year-old tech entrepreneur who once worked for Tim Hudak, former leader of the Ontario Progressive Conservatives. Chang, a self-described longtime Israel supporter, called CJPAC programs "the best training in the country." ■

Embarrassing moments on stage for a good cause

sshefa@thecjn.ca

Anyone who has survived the agony of adolescence understands the urge to suppress that most awkward life stage deep, deep down into one's subconscious.

But Jewish Family & Child's (JF&CS) Emerging Leaders group has called on a number of the community's young professionals to exploit their most horrifically embarrassing moments for a good cause.

On May 21, JF&CS Emerging Leaders – young professionals in their 20s and 30s who aim to raise awareness and funds for the non-profit agency – will present Cringe Worthy at The Garrison in downtown Toronto.

Hosted by Toronto Poetry Slam founder David Silverberg, about 10 performers will present a comedy show featuring hilarious and embarrassing autobiographical stories live on stage in an effort to raise money to send Jewish kids to camp.

Jodi Klaiman, the communications and development co-ordinator at JF&CS, said performers will be sharing "embarrassing stories about their first crushes, super awkward, super weird things we do as teenagers, and there are some camp stories, but it's not entirely about camp. It's mostly just about being a weird teenager coming of age."

Although it is not a scripted show, as the presenters tell their stories, there will be photos and other images projected on a screen behind them.

"We've all gone through our awkward phase, so everyone can relate," Klaiman said. "It'll be a comedy show, there will be food, drinks… We'll have a little tuck shop for people to buy snacks… It should be a hilarious, cringe worthy event."

Klaiman said one of the stories involves a 13-year-old boy who had an intense crush on a girl and decided to confess his love to her over ICQ, an outdated instant messaging program.

"He wrote the message in WingDings, which is the font that is just symbols, because he thought she wouldn't understand."

Klaiman said the moment he sent the message, it occurred to him that if the girl copied and pasted the message and put it into another font, she'd be able to read it.

"So he freaked out, and of course, this was a time when people didn't know as much about computers, so he shut his computer off hoping it didn't send."

Lisa Winberg

Funds raised from this event will go toward a camp subsidy for underprivileged Jewish kids.

"Camp played such an important role in my childhood and truly shaped who I am as a person today. I wouldn't want anyone to miss out on that experience just because of their financial situation. Knowing that the money raised at Cringe Worthy will go toward sending kids to camp is something I feel really passionate about," Klaiman said.

"Last year, we sent 231 kids to camp, so we're hoping to send a few more with the money raised at the event."

Lisa Winberg, a 28-year-old member of the Emerging Leaders committee who is producing the Cringe Worthy show, said her mother, who is a past president of the JF&CS board, encouraged her to volunteer.

Having been involved in the community in a number of other initiatives including the Birthright leadership program and the Hoops for Israel basketball tournament, she said she was eager to get involved with a program that promotes the services provided by JF&CS.

"I think our biggest goal – if we raise a lot of money that would be wonderful… but ultimately, we want to make people aware of JF&CS and the great programs that are offered and to elevate it so people are more aware." ■

GUEST VOICE

Election result is disappointing, but status quo isn't viable

Issie Lyon, Karen Mock and Hart Schwartz

In a few days, Jewish families will gather around their seder tables to teach their children about the pain of enslavement and the joy of freedom. As Jews, we prayed and worked toward the day when we could be truly free and live in peace and security in our own homeland. Now that we have achieved this prized goal, we have a responsibility to apply our own hard learned lessons to everyone, not just our fellow Jews.

Canadian Jews should take the opportunity of Passover to discuss how best to support Israel so that it can effectively and sincerely negotiate a peace agreement that will be a foundation for security and democracy in Israel and Palestine. The status quo – a military administration of millions of disenfranchised Palestinians – is not a viable option. We owe it to our community, and especially our children, to provide them with all the information they need to make responsible decisions, not just relying on the dogma they read or hear from the far right or the far left.

As representatives of JSpaceCanada, a progressive Zionist group that is pro-Israel, pro-peace and pro-democracy, we are disappointed with the results of the recent Israeli election. The Likud party, led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, received 23 per cent of the total votes, while the hard-right parties combined garnered just one-third of the Israeli electorate's support (roughly the same as in the last election). Based on these numbers, voters cannot be said to have supported settlement expansion. And yet, political parties that espouse this view will most likely form the next government.

We understand why it was difficult for some Israelis to vote for change. And we recognize the legitimate security concerns of Israeli voters, especially considering the instability in the region. We share their distrust of Israel's sworn enemies, including Iran, Islamic State (ISIS), Hezbollah and Hamas. But we also believe that a well-negotiated two-state solution is in the long-term best interests of everyone in the Middle East. Unfortunately, the possibility of a sustainable, peaceful two-state solution has now been severely compromised.

> We understand why it was difficult for some Israelis to vote for change

Like most Jews in Canada, we believe in peace, justice and democracy. And so we are urging all Jews to discuss the results of the Israeli election openly around their seder tables. We should have the courage to discuss a variety of ways in which Canadian Jews can support Israel constructively, so that it becomes a true democracy for all its residents while, at the same time, continues to be a homeland for all Jews.

Similarly, Canadian Jewish community leaders also have a responsibility to reflect the wide variety of opinions that exist in the Canadian Jewish community. Our federal political leaders and the media ought to hear that there is an honest difference of opinion within the Jewish community on how best to support Israel.

In the Diaspora, supporting every action of the current Israeli government without deliberation is not necessarily being a good friend of Israel. The questioning of specific Israeli government actions by thoughtful Jews, including settlement expansion, is positive and productive.

We hope that Canada will continue to reinforce its official policy and encourage the new Israeli government not to give up on negotiating a two-state solution, while striving for safety, security, peace, justice and democracy for all.

Israel has a dynamic democracy for its citizens, including Arab-Israelis. We applaud the vibrancy of that democracy and respect the outcome of this election. And we look forward to future elections, which we hope will reflect a more positive outlook for the State of Israel. ■

Issie Lyon, Karen Mock and Hart Schwartz are on the co-ordinating committee of JSpaceCanada.

Record growth at Sutton Group Admiral: "if you build it, they will come"

Murray and Sol Goldkind had a vision: a state-of-the-art home selling environment in an environment that felt like...well, home.

How novel.

"In brainstorming about the type of facility in which to accommodate the growth of our sales force, the one thing we kept coming back to is that the new home for our agents and brokers should be more than just another four-wall office environment," says Broker of Record Murray Goldkind. "It occurred to us that most of the new real estate offices being built to sell more homes don't feel like home themselves."

"A great salesperson will be successful regardless of his or her surroundings," says Sol, "but creating an office environment that feels like home puts everyone in a house-selling frame of mind."

A growing number of talented agents and brokers agree. The spike in Sutton Group Admiral's growth curve since the opening of the new Centre Street office proves that "if you build it, they will come." In recent months, Sutton Group Admiral has welcomed aboard numerous industry stalwarts like Andrea Halpern, Essie Sher, Evelyn James, Michael Benchimol, Alex Chalmiev, Rick Shapiro, Ella Bendersky and Emily Paskarou.

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Andrea Halpern, formerly of Remax Realtron, has settled into her new digs without skipping a beat. Except she doesn't "settle."

"Never" says Andrea. "My customers don't settle for less than the best, nor do I. Sutton Group Admiral provides a level of technical and administrative support that allows me to maintain a singular focus on my customers' needs. As a brokerage, I can't ask for anything more."

This eye-on-the-prize philosophy is nothing new at Sutton Group Admiral. "It's always been about the customer," says Murray. "Their needs come first."

Serving those needs means getting the seller's best return on their property and the buyer the best value. "Our people can only do that if all of their energies are focused on their clients' needs. You can't operate at a fast clip if you're looking for paper clips."

"Since Day One," says Sol, "we have never rested on our laurels. "In this business, if you're not three steps ahead of the game, then you're behind it."

In the case of the new Centre Street office, "three steps ahead" might be an understatement. In its 15,000 square feet of state-of-the-art office space, the new Centre Street office houses the kind of cuttingedge services and facilities that Admiral agents need to further enhance the top-drawer service they give their clients.

This is the Sutton Group Admiral formula in action: maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents and brokers.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team — now close to 400 salespeople and brokers — has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to further its presence in the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Murray prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Restoring an architect's legacy

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Toronto architect Benjamin Brown (1890-1974) designed many elegant edifices across the city, including the Balfour and Tower buildings on Spadina Avenue, the former Primrose Club on Willcocks Avenue, the former Beth Jacob Synagogue on Henry Street, the Hermant Building (eastern tower and annex) in Dundas Square, and scores of residences, theatres, factories, hotels and low-rise office and apartment buildings.

Possessing a trove of about 1,500 of Brown's blueprints, drawings and renderings, the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre has launched an $80,000 fundraising campaign to conserve and digitize his somewhat precarious paper legacy as well as to celebrate his significant but largely unsung contribution to Toronto's urban fabric.

Towards the latter end, the OJA is preparing to spotlight Brown's works in an exhibition in a prominent city venue, possibly the Gladstone Hotel, in the spring of 2016.

"The idea is to show the recently conserved drawings that will help explore Benjamin Brown's process," said OJA director Dara Solomon. "The larger narrative – what we really want to do with this exhibition – is to position Brown as one of Toronto's important early architects, because he died in obscurity."

Brown's art-deco Balfour Building and his Tower Building, which salute each other across the Spadina-Adelaide intersection, are considered the architectural gateways of Spadina Avenue. The city has designated both buildings, along with the Beth Jacob (now a Russian Orthodox church) and the Hermant and Commodore buildings, as heritage properties.

One of Toronto's first Jewish architects, Brown began his career soon after graduating from architectural school in 1913, initially in partnership with architect Robert McConnell. He did much of his work for the Jewish community and seems to have attained his professional peak during the 1920s and 1930s.

Upon his death, Brown left his entire life's work to Jim Levine, a fellow architect and friend. When Levine went to Brown's home to retrieve the drawings, he found – according to a brief essay by Levine's son Jay – "a dusty and deteriorating collection piled around, on top of and even inside of an old Edsel."

Levine stored the collection for 13 years before offering it to the Centre for Canadian Architecture in Montreal. They rejected it, dismissing Brown as "a minor regional talent." Next Levine contacted the OJA's then-director Stephen Speisman to see if there was anything worth saving. "When Dr. Speisman saw what we had, he could hardly contain his excitement," Jay Levine writes.

Brown's works include the Brunswick Avenue Talmud Torah, the Rubinoff department store, the Old Spain restaurant for Lazar Levinson, a fur factory with apartments for the Schipper brothers, renovations for the Beach Hebrew Institute and McCaul Street Synagogue, and numerous service stations, warehouses and garages.

He also drew posh residences for Louis Gelber, Mendel Granatstein, Henry Greisman, Samuel Lavine, Ira Levy, Mandel Mehr, Sophia Rochman, Morris Spring, Irving Stone, Jacob Tenenbaum and many other clients. These are among the roughly 150 projects, large and small, represented in his prolific and varied oeuvre.

Brown also dabbled in theatres but, contrary to urban legend, he may not have had a huge part in the design of the Standard Theatre, the storied Yiddish theatre that opened in 1922 at the northeast corner of Dundas and Spadina. (Later a movie theatre and burlesque house, the heritage-designated structure now houses a bank and some shops.) Although Heritage Toronto names Brown as the architect– as did the Globe in a glowing account of the theatre's opening – the dozens of detailed blueprints in the Brown collection bear the unmistakable architectural imprint of J. M. Jeffrey.

Based in Toronto early in his career, Jeffrey left in the early 1920s for the United States, where he participated in the design of such buildings as the Sherry-Netherland and Pierre Hotels in New York, and the Biltmore chain of hotels.

Did Brown only put the finishing touches on the Standard after Jeffrey's departure? "It's a bit of a mystery," concedes archivist Donna Bernardo-Ceriz as she carefully unfurls some of the Standard's delicate blueprints on a large table. "We're hoping that an architectural historian will be able to fill us in on that." ■

This is the fourth in a series of articles to be published periodically about Toronto's Jewish institutions, funded by the J. B. & Dora Salsberg Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. This series is in partnership with the Ontario Jewish Archives, Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre and draws on their collections: www.ontariojewisharchives.org

McMaster undergrads endorse BDS motion

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

Boycott supporters celebrate. TWITTER PHOTO

Although a motion in favour of the boycott, sanctions and divestment (BDS) campaign against Israel was passed March 23 at the McMaster Student Union's general assembly, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is raising questions about its legitimacy.

The BDS motion received 622 votes in support, 28 against, and 77 students abstained.

Last year, students voted in favour of a BDS motion, but the assembly did not have quorum, making it a non-binding resolution.

This year, the assembly did have quorum – more than 633 students – and students voted overwhelmingly in favour of the motion, but CIJA's associate communications director Steve McDonald said the people who introduced the motion did so in violation of the undergraduate student union's bylaws.

The bylaws state that public notice of any general assembly meeting must be given through student email, in the student newspaper and on the MSU website at least 10 school days in advance of the meeting. Otherwise, quorum must increase to 10 per cent of the MSU membership.

"When this was raised as a point of order, the chair made excuses for why proper notice was not given and decided to ignore the bylaw requirements in favour of some vague clause in the student union's constitution," McDonald wrote in an email to The CJN.

"Our perspective is that this motion passed at a meeting in explicit violation of the student union's own bylaws and constitution. This puts into question the legitimacy of the entire motion."

The motion, endorsed by Hamilton-based organizations and McMaster student groups including Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, Independent Jewish Voices Hamilton and Hamilton Coalition to Stop the War, called on the student body to "commit to identifying and divesting from companies that support or profit from Israeli war crimes, occupation and oppression of Palestinians."

Raphael Szajnfarber, McMaster Hillel's director of Jewish student life called the vote "undemocratic" because no time was allowed to debate the issue, "silencing all other student opinions with over an hour still remaining in the meeting."

He said this, as well as the fact the bylaw about prior notice of the meeting was not enforced, undermined the vote's legitimacy.

McMaster student Jacob Klugsberg said he drafted an amendment to the BDS motion outlining a general ethical purchasing policy that would have applied to all countries and companies equally.

But Szajnfarber said it was rejected.

"The BDS activists showed their true interest, which has nothing to do with human rights and everything to do with demonizing Israel, and Israel alone, based on discrimination and hate," he said.

Despite the endorsement of the BDS campaign by the student union, Szajnfarber said he is encouraged by McMaster's recent commitment to increase partnerships and joint initiatives with Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Technion Israel Institute of Technology.

Judy Zelikovitz, CIJA's vice president, university and local partner services, said there isn't a single North American university that has endorsed the BDS movement.

"The McMaster administration should explicitly state that the student union's discriminatory resolution will have no effect on the university's policies and programs," Zelikovitz said.

McMaster spokesperson Gord Arbeau said the university would not be issuing a formal statement against the BDS motion, but he told The CJN that this is a matter for the student union to handle.

"Certainly, we welcome and reaffirm their right to have these discussions and debate these issues, but it is separate from the day-to-day business of the university. It's a student union matter... and now the students union will determine how to move forward," Arbeau said.

Last month at McMaster, tensions flared between pro-Israel and anti-Israel students after students staged a die-in to protest a visit by a delegation of four Israelis whose aim was to promote their country's diversity.

In recent years, student unions at universities such as York, Carleton, Trent, Concordia, the University of Regina and the University of Toronto have endorsed similar resolutions to boycott Israel.

At McGill University last month, however, students rejected a BDS motion at the winter semester general assembly Students' Society of McGill University (SSMU). It was the second such motion introduced at a SSMU general assembly in the current academic year. A motion in the fall was also defeated. ■

UBC students reject boycott against Israel

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT, VANCOUVER

A student referendum at the University of British Columbia on boycotts, divestment and sanctions (BDS) against Israel failed to pass last week after the yes side didn't get the required percentage of votes.

Among students who chose to vote on whether they want their student union to support the BDS campaign against Israel, 3,493 voted "yes" and 2,223 voted "no." The referendum required a quorum of 4,130 "yes" votes, or about eight per cent of UBC's 48,000 students, in order to pass.

"We are proud to announce that after a long and rough campaign period, we have succeeded in keeping BDS off of our campus!" the group UBC Students Against BDS said in a statement. "This is a great day for peace and dialogue at UBC."

Students were asked to respond to the question: "Do you support your student union (AMS) in boycotting products and divesting from companies that support Israeli war crimes, illegal occupation and the oppression of Palestinians?"

The vote was held March 23 to 27 by the Alma Mater Society (AMS), which represents all students and says its mission is "to improve the quality of the educational, social and personal lives of the students of UBC."

The referendum was a contentious issue even among members of the AMS executive committee, which received the request for a vote from a student member of the campus club Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR). A referendum is granted when the AMS receives a petition with a minimum of 1,000 student signatures.

SPHR said in a statement that "boycotts and divestments have and continue to be a powerful, peaceful method for change in the world" and that "UBC students have a history of utilizing referendums to garner support for marginalized groups."

"Subject to continued military occupation, annexation of land, underdevelopment, discriminatory treatment, and military assault, the Palestinian people, including students on our campus, deserve the solidarity of UBC students. By voting 'Yes' on this question, you encourage investigation into UBC's ties with any companies that might maintain the occupation of Palestinian territories, set a precedent against any future involvement with such, and show symbolic solidarity with Palestinians."

On March 4, the AMS council gathered to discuss the question and released a statement saying that the "passing of this referendum will go against one of the primary objectives of the society, to promote unity and goodwill amongst our members."

The AMS council endorsed "any vote but yes," but said it "could not launch a full campaign and further direct the executive committee to release a single communication statement that states the AMS' stance on the BDS referendum."

Rabbi Philip Bregman

On March 24, the council amended this vague wording by adding that "a yes vote would isolate certain members of the AMS and go against the ideals of inclusivity and the promotion of a safe and discrimination-free community for our members."

Rabbi Philip Bregman, director of Hillel UBC, said the AMS could have rejected the referendum. "We've been fighting this referendum since November," he told The CJN as the vote was ongoing. "The AMS could have chosen not to put out the referendum on a number of bases we gave them, but it was their choice to put it out. It contains the phrase 'Israeli war crimes' despite the fact that Israel has never been convicted of war crimes. It targets Israelis and Jews on campus and puts a toxicity into campus."

Rabbi Bregman cited a number of recent incidents on campus in response to the referendum, including swastikas that were found in two campus residences.

As well, earlier this month, another campus club that had planned to collaborate with the Jewish Students' Association in making peanut butter jelly sandwiches for the homeless was pulling out. "They said they didn't want to be seen with Jews this week during the voting. We believe this referendum is about hate," he said.

Darren Mackoff, director of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), Pacific region, said his organization has been working to confront BDS at UBC.

"From ongoing outreach to the student government, school administration, other student groups and leaders and the campus body at large, the message has been clear: BDS stands for hate, closes down dialogue and flies in the face of UBC's longstanding academic, democratic and multicultural values. It's a message which has resonated strongly at UBC."

The AMS declined to be interviewed. ■

Crafting brings smiles to sick children

SUSAN MINUK
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Pamela Bielak knows a lot about crafts. She is the founder of Crafting for a Cure (CFC), a not-for-profit, registered charity that helps give children a positive experience when a hospital visit is necessary.

The charity donates craft kits for sick children and teenagers to 90 hospitals across North America, Israel and Kenya.

"We create and supply craft kits, which are used in emergency rooms, clinic treatment rooms and operating waiting rooms," Bielak explained.

CFC registered its 16-year-old organization five years ago.

Bielak, 44, is the mother of twins, who are also 16 years of age. At the time of their birth, one of the twins was diagnosed with a lung condition, and Bielak found she needed something to occupy her time during her lengthy visits to the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto.

"Daniel was a severely asthmatic child, experiencing collapsed lungs and seizures. For years, we found ourselves in and out of SickKids. During my visits, I had to find something for my daughter, Naiomi [Daniel's twin], to do. I started to bring crafts to pass the time, and parents would ask if I brought any extra," Bielak recalled.

Frustrated with the lack of activities and resources in the lung clinic playroom at SickKids, Bielak set out on her first creative initiative: the renovation of the playroom.

At the time, she was creating a scrapbooking line, and she shared it with children at the hospital. Crafting for a Cure evolved from that.

"I designed cutouts for kids. I had a Jewish line, one for kids [who were] amputees and an asthma line. If there was a child with asthma, there would be a picture of a child with his/her puffer running across the finish line saying, 'I did it.' If there was an amputee child, there would be a special prosthetic leg showing them running a race. And I had cutouts for all the Jewish holidays.

"I don't like to see any child not smile," she said.

Today, with a house filled with crafts and a packed storage unit with related products, Bielak has seen her passion multiply, as her organization supplies some 40,000 craft kits a year.

Having never drawn a paycheque, Bielak relies on corporate sponsors to help supply the craft materials and community volunteers to help package and assemble the craft kits in preparation for shipments that cost an average of $5,000 to ship.

CFC volunteers also promote school-and community-wide programs such as Creating Breathing Space and Kilometers for Kids (K4K). Creating Breathing Space provides a space for teens who suffer from mental health illnesses. K4K is a mini-marathon fundraiser held at schools, where students raise money through sponsorship.

Craft kit shipments go out four to five times a year across North America, while Kenya receives one shipment of 5,000 craft kits a year.

Armed with supplies including glass and crystal beads, yarn, foam, stickers, crayons, wires, puzzles and other materials, Bielak along with her friend Serena Farberman and numerous CFC volunteers – often visits hospitals to craft with patients.

Last year, Bielak and Farberman travelled to Israel to personally deliver more than $20,000 worth of art supplies to both the Wilf Children's Hospital at the Shaare Zedek Medical Center and Schneider Children's Medical Center of Israel. Bielak told The CJN about a 12-year-old Jewish boy who had only a few days to live.

"I was told the child probably wouldn't respond; nevertheless, I went into his room hopefully, with crafts and a smile. He was lying in bed looking peaceful, with no tubes or anything to suggest he was ill. We started talking. His English wasn't so great, but neither was my Hebrew. I gave him a puzzle and he told me how much he loved to do 3D craft puzzles. His parents started crying, saying they hadn't seen their son smile in weeks. The boy passed away in his sleep approximately a week after my visit, but he finished that puzzle I gave him, and that was his goal. He died with a smile."

Pamela Bielak, second from right, at Shaare Zedek Hospital in Israel last year with a young patient named David holding his puzzle craft with his parents at his side.

Crafting together can have many rewards. "Seeing Jews and Muslims engaged with their kids, one is forced to forget politics, even for a brief moment. Crafting is an amazing distraction. Kids are smiling, not focusing on their illness, and are even giving the parent an extra break as well," Bielak said with a smile. ■

Ex-Winnipeg Jewish Theatre head charged with theft, forgery

Police allege former artistic director embezzled more than $85,000 and had issued warrant for his arrest in January

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

After his abrupt dismissal last year, rumours swirled about the circumstances of Michael Nathanson's abrupt departure from the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre (WJT), and it now appears that there was substance to them.

Nathanson, 48, the former artistic director of the WJT who was fired in February 2014, was arrested March 27 and charged with theft and forgery. Several media outlets have reported that he stands accused of embezzling more than $85,000 from the 27-year-old theatre company. It was forced to shut down temporarily at the time of Nathanson's firing due to a financial crunch whose details were unspecified.

As reported in The Canadian Jewish News at the time of his firing, Nathanson was hired as artistic director for the 2006-07 season, succeeding longtime artistic director Kayla Gordon who left to pursue other ventures in the theatre world.

A former Winnipegger, Nathanson had been living in the United States, where he was trying to make it as a playwright, before being hired by the WJT.

He came aboard at an earlier low point in the WJT's financial health. Over his first four seasons, the WJT enjoyed an artistic revitalization. Productions of Death of a Salesman in January 2008 and Lenin's Embalmers in October 2010 were the two best-attended shows of the past decade.

In the spring of 2012, Nathanson and the WJT staged the ambitious and costly Angels in America: Millenium Approaches. While the production received much critical praise, it lost money, as did Perestroika, which kicked off the theatre's 25th season the following fall.

Reports by both the Winnipeg Free Press and CBC News said that, according to police, Nathanson took advantage of his dual position as artistic director and general manager in charge of the theatre company's finances to embezzle thousands of dollars and covered up the thefts by forging documents to make the company's books look like they were in order.

Michael Nathanson

Nathanson, who has dual citizenship, left Winnipeg for Texas shortly after the thefts were brought to the attention of investigators early last year.

In January, police issued a Manitoba-wide warrant for his arrest. He was arrested last Friday when he tried to return to the province.

Police told the Winnipeg Sun that he still has children in the city that he may have been returning to see.

He has been charged with theft over $5,000 and forgery and remains in custody.

The board of the WJT is declining to comment on the matter, said board vice-president Greg DiCresce, as the case is before the courts.

The WJT itself has bounced back from the setback. Last fall, it announced a new season under the direction of interim (and former) artistic director Gordon.

Last December, the theatre company staged a very successful three-day run of A Jew Grows in Brooklyn, starring Jake Ehrenreich.

In May, the WJT will be staging the Canadian premiere of the New York hit play Bad Jews.

And last month, as reported in The CJN, the theatre hired Torontonian Ari Weinberg as its new artistic director. ■

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

There's a vintage photograph of Louis Rubenstein that captures his era beautifully. Rubenstein is wearing a blazer bedecked with an assortment of medals. He sports a bowler hat and his visage is dominated by a thick moustache that the heir to the Austro-Hungarian empire might have worn. And, to top it off, so to speak, he's wearing a pair of figure skates.

Whether his costume was considered as flamboyant in his day as those worn by today's sequin-studded ice dancers is an open question. But Rubenstein, who lived from 1861 to 1931, was certainly the spiritual ancestor of today's elite Canadian figure skaters.

A multiple national champion in the 1880s, he went on to win the unofficial world figure skating championship in 1890, defying the anti-Semitic Czarist government in St. Petersburg to do so.

Recently, if not belatedly, the government of Canada designated Rubenstein "a national historic person."

A bronze plaque will be erected in his honour at a location yet to be determined, said Julie Dompierre, director of the commemoration branch of Parks Canada. Rubenstein will then join a select company of only 2,000 people, places and events with the national historic designation, she said.

Rubenstein not only excelled as "a fancy skater," the name given to figure skating in the day, but also played an important role as a builder of the sport. He helped organize the Amateur Skating Association of Canada, the forerunner of Skate Canada. "It was a significant factor in why [we] felt his contribution was above and beyond his athletic ability," Dompierre said.

Rubenstein, the son of Polish immigrants, was born and grew up in Montreal. According to a report by a board recommending his designation by Environment Minister Leona Aglukkaq, Rubenstein won Canadian championships from 1883 to 1889, as well as the North American title in 1885 and the U.S. championships in 1888, 1889 and 1891.

In 1890, he attended the first ever World Figure Skating Championship in St. Petersburg, Russia. There "he faced anti-Semitism and was able to participate only through the intervention of Lord Stanley, the British ambassador to Russia," according to a report prepared for the minister.

Louis Rubenstein

Rubenstein was nominated by University of Toronto historian Bruce Kidd, a former track star and Olympic athlete.

Kidd said he has long taken an interest in Canadian sports history and felt that the combination of Rubenstein's accomplishments in competition and his work to build the sport merited inclusion as a designated historic figure.

"He was a giant of the sport. He competed all over North America. He was a household name. Wherever he skated, he attracted huge crowds...He contributed to Canadian sport his whole life," Kidd said.

Rubenstein was inducted into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame (IJSHF) in 1981, and the World Figure Skating Hall of Fame in 1984.

"He was a career sportsman," said the IJSHF. "After retiring from active skating, Rubenstein held the presidency of various Canadian organizations representing tenpin bowling, curling, bicycling, tobogganing, lifesaving, and ice skating. He is called the Father of Bowling in Canada."

Rubenstein was a partner in the family firm of silver platers and manufacturers, and was a Montreal alderman from 1914 to 1931. ■

GUEST VOICE

Rebranding signals a newer Ve'ahavta

Robyn Segall

When I first learned about Ve'ahavta, about 12 years ago, I was a non-Hebrew-speaking, culturally affiliated young adult in Toronto. I had just returned from the first ever cohort of Birthright Israel and a dynamic Jewish world suddenly opened up to me.

I wanted to volunteer in the community, but didn't know where to start. I knew I wanted to do something Jewishly meaningful, but not necessarily in a shul environment. A friend told me about Ve'ahavta, that I could go there and make sandwiches for the homeless.

I was welcomed with warm open arms and felt at home immediately.

My initial volunteer experience on the Mobile Jewish Response to the homeless outreach van penetrated my heart in a profound way. I felt empowered and purposeful, and I wanted more. I then volunteered for nearly every Ve'ahavta program and department. Two years later, I left my corporate job and started as a full-time employee. It's been 10 years, and I have never looked back.

Often people ask me what keeps me here after so many years. This is what I tell them: my Judaism continues to be defined and re-defined, but one thing which remains constant is the inherent value of tikkun olam – repairing the world. I believe that as a relatively privileged community, we have the obligation to reach out and help all those in need, regardless of who they are.

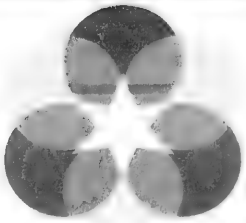
When Ve'ahavta was founded by Avrum Rosensweig in 1996, the concept lacked support, perhaps because it was misunderstood. Many naysayers thought it was ludicrous to think the Jewish community would want to support an organization that helps non-Jews. In that sense, Ve'ahavta was something of a "rebel" organization in the Jewish community.

Our original logo – a black Torah scroll with an illuminated heart in the middle – was designed as an expression of our bold nature, and our commitment to be a "light unto the nations." Unlike the typical Jewish agency logos, Ve'ahavta's stood out and became a brand people associated with our unique personality. However, it also caused confusion for some – what is that black blob? A splash of paint? An apron? Is that a Torah scroll is this a yeshiva? And what does that tiny writing say underneath the name?

Despite the challenges, our original logo served us well for 18 years. But now it's time for change.

When I founded Ve'ahavata's marketing department in 2011, I recognized we were heading down a path of growth and that our brand needed to keep up with us. A rebrand was one of our first objectives. The question was: how do we remain true to our unique identity, our values, and our rich history? How do we maintain the soulfulness people know us for and avoid the myriads of mainstream logos and catalog marketing that seems to prevail in our industry?

The bright colours of our new logo represent the vitality and hope the organization stands on. Yellow is reminiscent of the original brand. Blue is evocative of the Jewish community. The blending of the two creates a vibrant green, which represents the bridging of diverse groups and individuals. The overlapping circles represent the inclusivity and collaboration integral to Ve'ahavta's humanitarian ideals. And at the heart of the circles, a stylized Star of David represents the light of the Jewish soul shining through and guiding our actions.



The new Ve'ahavta logo

Our name, of course, has not changed. "Ve'ahavta" is derived from the line in the Torah "ve'ahavta lere'acha kamocha" "and you shall love your neighbour as yourself."

A rebrand does not mean a "new Ve'ahavta," but a "newer Ve'ahatva." Progress demands change, and change demands progress. This rebrand is our commitment to progress, an evolution deeply rooted in our past, lessons learned, and achievements that have brought us to this point in time.

Roy Salomon first Canadian honoured by Maccabi USA

MARVIN GLASSMAN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN BOCA RATON

Roy Salomon

Although former Maccabi Canada president Roy Salomon has been recognized numerous times in his own country, he became the first Canadian citizen to be honoured by Maccabi USA in a recent ceremony here for his 46-year involvement with Maccabi Canada and the World Maccabi Union.

Salomon was cited along with 14 other outstanding Jewish athletes, organizers and volunteers at the Legends of the Maccabiah Gala Brunch.

Salomon represents part of the rich history and tradition of excellence of Canadian Jewish athletes and organizers at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Held every four years following an Olympics year, the Maccabiah Games is considered the third largest sports movement in the world, behind only the Olympics and Pan American Games.

Maccabi USA presented Salomon with the Maccabi Spirit Award for being one of the few people in Canada to have contributed to the Maccabi organization on the local, national and international levels.

"From the moment I represented Canada in basketball at the 1969 Maccabiah Games, I felt moved to be with the Maccabiah Games for a lifetime. The thrill of hearing and seeing 60,000 spectators cheer all the athletes at the opening ceremonies is a thrill I will never forget," said Salomon, 78, at the tribute where the other honorees were Americans.

Salomon moved to Montreal from Brooklyn in 1960 to form a real estate development company that established the Cavendish Mall in Côte St. Luc, among other commercial properties.

A past president of Maccabi Canada for eight terms from 1993-2001, Salomon always was close to the many athletes he recruited to the Maccabiah Games for decades.

He is credited with pushing for the addition of junior athletes (14 and under) with athletic competitions in separate categories. The first juniors competed at the Maccabiah Games in 1985.

"The popularity of junior athletes has grown so much that they represent close to a third of the athletes that go to the Maccabiah Games," he said. "Many of the junior athletes, moved by the trip and competition in Israel, often return to the Games in the open category and fare well because of their experiences at the junior level."

Salomon was a key player on the international level at the Maccabi World Union for mediating relations between Australia, four of whose Maccabiah team members were killed as a result of the 1997 bridge collapse at the Games' opening, and Israel.

"Australia continued to fund teams for the Games and we have paid tribute to their athletes since the accident," he said.

Salomon, who was the honorary vice-president of the Maccabi World Union, won the Yakir International Award for his efforts with the Australian Maccabi organization.

Salomon also is credited with raising the profile of Maccabi Canada by inviting hockey great Jean Béliveau to serve as the Canadian team's chef de mission at the 1985 and 1997 Games.

The 1997 Games was another milestone for Salomon as the Canadian hockey team won gold under the tutelage of coach Jacques Demers, who also coached the Montreal Canadiens to their last Stanley Cup in 1993.

"It really was the Maccabi Canada organization and not me that was responsible for both Jacques [Demers] and Jean [Béliveau] being involved with the Maccabiah Games," he said with characteristic modesty.

Along with Maccabi USA president Bob Spivack, Salomon was the honorary co-chair at the last Maccabiah Games in 2013.

He also founded the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame originally at the Davis YM-YWHA in 1979 and was honoured at the 2013 Sports Celebrity Breakfast, benefiting the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors Foundation.

Among the others feted at the brunch were: former 1956 Wimbledon doubles tennis champion Angela Buxton, former professional golfer Bruce Fleisher, (who competed at the Canadian Open golf championship many times), and former National Basketball Association player Danny Schayes, who played against the Toronto Raptors before his retirement in 1999. ■

Camp Wingate will carry on Pripstein's traditons

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Camp Wingate, on the site of the now-closed Pripstein's, looks onto picturesque Lac des Trois Frères in St. Adolphe d'Howard.

It's not a revival of Pripstein's, but the new Camp Wingate will open this summer on the same Laurentian site and carry on many of the former camp's traditions.

Camp Wingate director Laurie Wiseman said registration is sufficient to allow the new private sleepaway camp in St. Adolphe d'Howard to begin operations this season. "We only started in February, which is a little late," said Wiseman, "but we have enough campers to go ahead. We are a relatively small camp."

The camp, which can accommodate up to about 200 children, is continuing to accept registration, she said.

The co-ed camp for kids aged 7-17 years will run for 6-1/2 weeks, with two 4-1/2 and full-session (June 25-Aug. 10) options available.

"The bulk of those registering are Pripstein's returnees – they are a very loyal group but we have new people as well," she said. "We're trying to reach out to others."

Wiseman, who attended Pripstein's for 13 years during which she became the camp's first female head counsellor, and another ex-camper and counsellor Cory Pecker, a former professional hockey player, are the prime movers behind Camp Wingate.

Like Pripstein's, the camp is open to everyone, but will have a Jewish vibe.

Both were shocked when majority owner Ronnie Braverman announced in December that he was closing Pripstein's Camp Mishmar – its formal name – after 74 years. Braverman, who is a grandson of founders Chaim and Pearl Pripstein, said enrolment had been declining for decades, blaming that on the decline of the camp's traditional market: anglophone, relatively secular middle-class Montreal Jewish families. It was the last of the private Jewish camps that once flourished in the Laurentians.

Wiseman, who has owned and directed the Sunny Acres Day Camp in Ste. Anne de Bellevue since 1996, which now has 800 campers, and Pecker, who ran Pripstein's popular hockey program for some years, believe that there is still a niche for a camp like that.

"We are keeping the best of Pripstein's, its spirit and great facilities, and infusing our own ideas. The concept needed an overhaul, to be freshened up a little," said Wiseman. "But I think there is still a market. It's very doable."

Wiseman said they are leasing the property, which remains on the market for sale. She expects this arrangement to continue for "a few years" with purchase of the property part of the long-term plan.

Should a prospective buyer come along, Wiseman said Pecker and his brother Robby have "the first right of refusal," that is, they have the right to purchase the property on the same terms as offered by the third party. The camp is located on 200 lakeside acres.

Cory Pecker, who played for 15 years in the Ontario and American Hockey Leagues before ending his career in Switzerland, is director of athletics at Wingate, which has an ice hockey rink. Other amenities are an indoor pool and basketball court, outdoor tennis courts, an inline skating park, and water sports facilities. The hockey program is open equally to boys and girls.

The camp is named for the Wingate Institute, a sports training centre near Netanya, Israel, said Wiseman. Wingate was the name of an athletic program at Pripstein's sometime during her time there from between about 1980 to 1993.

The camp's logo is a winged "W" and the colours are blue and gold.

Wingate will maintain Pripstein's Jewish orientation. The food will be "kosher style," brachot will be said before meals, Israel's national anthem Hatikvah will be sung at the dinner-time flagpole, and an Oneg Shabbat will be held every Friday night, where prayers will be recited over candles and challah at a traditional Shabbat dinner, and Hebrew songs sung afterward.

While the sports component is strong, Wiseman said Wingate caters to a wide range of interests, in particular the visual and performing arts.

A special guest will be young adult novelist Sarah Mlynowski, a Montreal native now living in New York who spent 10 summers at Pripstein's.

All staff are at least 18 years old, she added. The "camp mother" is Josie Gold, who was a Pripstein's camper and staff member from 1972 to 1987, and remained the camp's graphics designer until it closed. She is married to another Pripstein's alumnus, Cleve Ziegler.

"We know what it takes to build a strong camp and we are committed to creating a truly special place for our campers, a camp that is small in size and where all campers are known and cared for, each for their own unique personality," said Wiseman. ■

Son of Canada's first black Jew recalls happy childhood

MYRON LOVE
PRAIRIES CORRESPONDENT

Like most other Jewish kids growing up in Winnipeg's north end in the 1940s and '50s, Bill Mahon attended public school by day and cheder in the evenings, went to shul with his dad on Shabbat, had a bar mitzvah, went to St. John's Tech for high school (where he was president of the student council) and hung out with his friends.

The only difference between Mahon and his friends was that his father was a black man – Emerson Swift Mahon.

Emerson Mahon was the subject of a feature in the Feb. 25 edition of The CJN, where he was profiled in honour of Black History Month and described as "Canada's first black Jew."

Originally from the Caribbean island of Grenada, Mahon, who was raised as an Anglican, came to Canada in his early 20s. He enlisted in the Canadian armed forces in World War I, where he met the Jewish chaplain, Rabbi Abramowitz, who inspired him to convert to Judaism.

Mahon underwent a formal Orthodox conversion in Montreal in 1921.

"This was no watered-down conversion," says his son, Bill. "He had to learn Hebrew and be able to recite the prayers."

Emerson Mahon

Mahon later moved to Winnipeg, where, in 1934, he met and married Faiga (Frances, in English) Golbert, who had recently arrived from Russia.

Although he earned a degree in science and a teaching certificate from the University of Manitoba, the only work he was able to find was as a porter on the trains.

The union of Emerson Mahon and Golbert produced two children, Bill – who is a financial planner in Winnipeg, and older sister, Ethel, who left Winnipeg for the United States after graduating from the General Hospital School of Nursing. She passed away in 2002 at the age of 64.

> He rarely spoke about his parents, but he did speak fondly about one grandmother who was once a slave who was owned by Jewish plantation owners who treated her well.

Bill, who was born in 1940, said he had some family on his mother's side in Winnipeg, but that his father had no relatives here.

"He rarely spoke about his parents," Mahon said of his father, "but did speak fondly about one grandmother who, he said, was once a slave who was owned by Jewish plantation owners who treated her well. Perhaps that was a factor in his choosing Judaism."

Mahon, who has two daughters – one in Vancouver and another who lives in Toronto with her family – added that his father had five brothers and one sister.

Bill did get to meet three of his uncles and several cousins.

One favourite uncle converted to Islam about the same time that Emerson chose Judaism.

"That uncle was stationed in the Middle East in the Great War," Mahon said. "I have learned to be more tolerant of all religions."

Bill remembers his late father, who passed away in 1963 at age 71 following a lengthy illness, as a voracious reader who at bedtime read his kids stories from Greek and Roman mythology.

"I can still recite the old poem, King Bruce of Scotland, which was one of my father's favourites," Mahon said.

"Certainly, my family was different from my friends' families," Mahon noted. "That was neither good nor bad. I had a wonderful childhood.

"There were some redneck Jews in the community. The bottom line, though, is that my father was a practising Jew." ■

Heads of Reform movement head west

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

As he prepared to embark on his first trip to western Canada as president of the Union for Reform Judaism (URJ), Rabbi Rick Jacobs said he hoped to convey to the Reform synagogues he'd be visiting in Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton that the movement sees its core work as strengthening congregations.

"I want to help them thrive and adapt to the new realities of the 21st century, to the opportunities [for our synagogues] to engage people outside our walls and practice a kind of audacious hospitality," he explained.

Last weekend, the New York-based Rabbi Jacobs, along with Paul Leszner, the Toronto-based president of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ) – which represents 26 Reform congregations across Canada – took a whirlwind trip to visit Vancouver's Temple Sholom, Calgary's Temple B'nai Tikvah and Edmonton's Temple Beth Ora.

In addition to building bridges across the network of Reform congregations in North America – the roughly 900 member synagogues represented by the URJ – the trip was timed to let Rabbi Jacobs and Leszner help the shuls mark their respective milestone anniversaries: Temple Sholom, with 680 families, celebrates its 50th anniversary this year, while both the 340-family B'nai Tikvah and Temple Beth Ora and its 200 members are commemorating their 36th years.

"[This visit] is a chance for me to see the vitality and unique work being done in our various congregations and to increase our impact," Rabbi Jacobs said, adding, "In Canada, the Reform movement is not as large as in the U.S., but I want these shuls to feel part of the North American Reform Jewish community and to see what's growing throughout the movement."

To that end, Rabbi Jacobs, who planned to speak at all three congregations, said he would be emphasizing to the shuls that the movement is deeply involved in tikkun olam and "standing for profound, prophetic social justice values."

Further, he wanted to stress that it's extremely committed to Israel and to showing Jews worldwide "the uniqueness and strength of Reform Judaism past, present and future."

Leszner, who noted this trip was the fourth or fifth Canadian tour he's helped arrange for Rabbi Jacobs, said that having the head of the movement visit is "a very large deal."

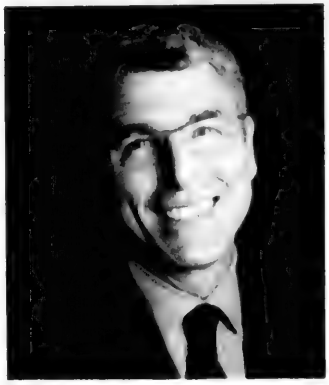
"I don't want to refer to him as the pope, but he has a huge impact," Leszner joked. "He leads all of us in the movement in terms of the standards, codes and vision for Reform Judaism on things like Israel and progressive Judaism."

He outlined their itinerary, which included a meeting with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, dinner and services at Beth Sholom, Shabbat services at Temple B'nai Tikvah and a meeting with the shul board and dinner, Havdalah and a 36th-anniversary celebration at Beth Ora, as well as a meeting with its board.

The purpose of the board meetings, Leszner said, was for he and Rabbi Jacobs to address things the synagogues are concerned about, such as the future of Jewish leadership, sustaining membership numbers, synagogue economics, how to attract millennials and how to respectfully deal with interfaith marriages.

"[The latter] is a popular topic right now," Leszner said. "[Reform rabbis officiating at] interfaith weddings isn't done here in the GTA, but it's happening throughout the United States. So the question we're looking at is how to address this with the proper respect."

The boards will have the chance, too, to seek advice from Rabbi Jacobs and Leszner on issues particular to their congregations.



Rabbi Rick Jacobs

Rabbi Jacobs said he sees the Reform movement in Canada as being somewhat more traditional, in terms of religious observance, than its U.S. counterpart, and he noted the Canadian Reform movement's strong connection to Israel.

Despite the shuls in Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton being relatively small and more removed from larger Jewish centres, Rabbi Jacobs said he sees a real sense of strength and unity among them.

"We don't measure congregations by the number of households they have, but by their vibrancy and commitment to their activities." ■

SYDNEY WARSHAW AND KATHERINE (KAT) ROMANOW

Using food to explore Jewish culture

The duo of Sydney Warshaw and Katherine (Kat) Romanow are dedicated foodies who run the Wandering Chew, a Montreal program started in late 2013, sponsored by Federation CJA's Generations Fund and the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal.

They research Jewish cuisine in its international variety and the cultures that nourished it. Then they organize intimate "pop-up" dinners at different venues suited to the theme, cook the meal with the help of a professional chef, and invite other young adults to learn about different Jewish communities around the world through what they eat. The goal is to engage those who might otherwise not be attracted to community activities.

Warshaw, 25, comes from a long line of Jewish cooks. Her great-grandmother was one of the editor's of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's (CHW) classic cookbook A Treasure for My Daughter. A McGill University graduate in cultural studies and music history, she is currently studying law. She was previously social action co-ordinator in the federation's outreach and engagement department.

Romanow, 30, describes herself as a scholar of Jewish food. Her Judaic studies master's thesis at Concordia University was on the post-Passover Mimouna tradition among Montreal's Sephardim.

Iraqi, Mexican, U.S. Southern and, most recently, Scandinavian Jewish cooking have been featured at the dinners. The pair also teamed up with CHW to hold a Shavuot dinner last year, coinciding with the 14th printing of A Treasure, using recipes from that cookbook.

"We care about Jewish food, the culture that surrounds it, and its preservation and modernization," said Romanow. "Montreal has a diversity of Jewish communities whose food and culture deserve to be recognized." ■

JULIE GREENBAUM

Fighting Cancer- one party at a time

Five years ago, Julie Greenbaum was just 19 and living in Montreal when her mother died of ovarian cancer. Ten months after her mother's death, still reeling from the loss, she and her family put on their first event at a local nightclub, to raise money for cancer research.

"It started naturally. I wanted to engage my generation, so I threw a party... it was a fun, interactive way to raise money for a good cause and have fun."

That event for 350 people led to another, three times larger, and soon Greenbaum had a full-time non-profit organization on her hands, which was named Fuck Cancer.

"I really believe [the name] embodies the aggression and emotions that most people who've experienced the disease feel," she said.

Meanwhile, in Vancouver, another Jewish woman, Yael Cohen Braun, had started an identically named charity, inspired by her mother's bout with breast cancer. Braun's charity was largely web-based and encouraged young people to learn more about early cancer detection and prevention and to discuss cancer screening with their own parents.

About a year ago, the two charities merged, combining the women's formidable and complementary talents.

"It was pretty obvious that by joining forces we could achieve our goals more quickly," said Greenbaum. "It was a no-brainer."

In the last eight months, since the two charities merged, they have raised $500,000 for cancer screening programs, some of it earmarked for people who cannot afford tests.

Just a few weeks ago, Greenbaum moved to Los Angeles, to further expand the scope of the charity. A fundraising event is being planned for May in the city.

"The goal is to continue making the greatest impact we possibly can." ■

JODY SPIEGEL

Helping people key to director's career

Looking back on her career choices, Jody Spiegel knows she could have been in the world of corporate law, billing big numbers and doing well.

But it's likely none of her clients would have crocheted a baby blanket for her when she had her first child.

When you work with Holocaust survivors, helping them get their stories out to the public, you strike up personal relationships. That's what happened with Rachel Shtibel, who was so excited about Spiegel's pregnancy that she made a little welcome-to-the-world gift for her.

Those are the kinds of connections that make her job as director of the Azrieli Foundation's Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program particularly worthwhile.

The program takes survivors' memoirs and turns them into books for schools, libraries, and for sale commercially as first-hand accounts of the Holocaust.

So far, the foundation has published 51 books in French and English. This year's As the Lilacs Bloomed, is a memoir written in 1945 by Anna Molnar Hegedus, a Hungarian Holocaust survivor whose story had stayed within the family until recently. Hegedus wrote the memoir while waiting for the return of her daughter from a wartime death march.

Becoming a mother helped make survivors' stories into something she could better relate to, Spiegel, 36, said. Stories of mothers turning over their small children to the care of strangers in hopes for their survival touch her deeply.

Helping survivors tell their stories has given her own life more meaning. Working for the Azrieli Foundation and not for a big law firm was the best decision she made, Spiegel said.

"I wanted to help people whose voices were not being heard." ■

MITCHELL MARCUS

Love of theatre dates back to his youth

It didn't take long for the acting bug to hit Mitchell Marcus. He was only five when he dragooned his nanny to sit as his audience for a show he put on in the family basement. His younger sister, Dara, handled the lighting.

Not long after, his parents had an extra ticket to the Buddy Holly Story, a Broadway extravaganza. Young Mitchell was available and the performance – the spectacle, the acting, the music – stirred feelings of wonder. He was hooked.

Today, Marcus is 32, and his passion for the theatre continues unabated, though he no long treads the boards.

Marcus is the founding artistic director of Acting Up Stage Company, a not for profit outfit that focuses on "entertaining and poignant contemporary musicals."

Since 2004, Acting Up shows have attracted 37 Dora Mavor Moore Award nominations, eight Toronto Theatre Critics' Awards and seven Dora Mavor Moore Awards.

The company's greatest success came in 2012 when it staged Caroline, or Change. The plot involved a black maid working for a Jewish family in 1963 and included themes of family, work and current events, and it uses the kind of intelligent writing that Marcus relishes.

Audiences appreciate shows that are "meaningful, thought-provoking storytelling about relationships," he said.

Next up on Acting Up's agenda is Ballad of the Burning Star, an autobiographical show written by Israeli Nir Palvi.

The show is based on Palvi's personal interactions with Palestinians. It's a "crazy cabaret," Marcus said. "Without giving answers, it looks at his internal conflict, from being persecuted to being a persecutor."

Thought-provoking indeed. ■

HANNAH ALPER

12-year-old is a veteran blogger, activist

"Hi, I'm Hannah, welcome to my blog!

"I'm nine years old and just finished Grade 3! I launched this blog at the Digital Family Summit in July 2012."

Whoa! Stop right there.

A nine-year-old running a blog, speaking at the Digital Family Summit. What gives? She goes on: "I am passionate about the environment, and I was in a eco club in school. I also have interests in dogs, technology, I'm a big baseball fan! My favourite kind of music is pop. I have been to a lot of concerts!"

"Passionate" is a word that comes up frequently in a conversation with Hannah Alper, who is now 12 and in Grade 6. You can practically hear the exclamation marks as she describes her latest projects.

For a 12-year-old, she's done a lot interesting things and met a lot of fascinating people. She's met Martin Luther King III, son of the legendary civil rights advocate,and Martin Sheen, the actor who played the president on The West Wing, and she's talked with Oscar-winning actress Marlee Matlin – "she was really, really nice."

Alper started her blog, callmehannah.ca, to raise concerns about the environment and the effects of environmental degradation on wildlife.

Since launching the blog, she's branched out into other areas that motivate her – anti-bullying, Earth Day, clean water, children's rights.

One of her most satisfying ventures in the world of public advocacy was her participation in the We Create Change Tour, part of Free the Children initiative, which aimed to celebrate the way Canadian youths are helping their contemporaries around the world.

Alper has become something of a celebrity among young people. She's not shy to tell them that you, too, can make a difference. ■

NEIL CLOSNER

Medical marijuana business is growing

Neil Closner has run a lot of businesses, but his current role as CEO of MedReleaf is the most satisfying.

Not only is the licensed cannabis producer doing well financially, he also provides a product that has helped his mother cope with a chronic autoimmune disease.

Thanks to the marijuana she now ingests, she's able to get a good night's sleep for the first time in 10 years, and it has alleviated her pain to a great extent, Closner said.

In only a year and a half, MedReleaf has grown quickly. From three people, it now employs 80, and it's "the largest supplier of cannabis in Canada," Closner said.

MedReleaf is a privately held company and Closner is a minority shareholder, in addition to his role as CEO. He won't reveal the partners, but said one is Tikun Olam, an Israeli company in the medical marijuana business.

"They provide us with a lot of the intellectual property and we grow some of their genetic material," Closner said.

A native of Toronto, Closner, 41, began his business career on Wall Street in investment banking and venture capital. He's been CEO of several startups in Miami and Toronto in the technology and health-care fields.

He has served as vice-president of business development at Mount Sinai Hospital and he's a member of the board of directors of Technion Canada.

Despite success elsewhere, Toronto beckoned. Running a business like MedReleaf seemed like a good fit for someone with an interest in business and health care, who was close to his ailing mother.

"I thought it had the potential to help her," he said. ■

YEHUDA AZOULAY

Preserving Sephardic culture

Yehuda Azoulay, founder of the Sephardic Legacy Series Institute, is on a mission to preserve and promote Sephardic culture and bring it to the mainstream Jewish community.

About a month shy of his 29th birthday, Azoulay, has been working since 2007 to bring information about Sephardic history and culture to the forefront.

By the time Azoulay was 20 years old, he had written his first book, The Legacy of Leaders, a biographical history of Sephardic rabbis. To date, he's written five books, with his most recent titled Maran – The Life and Scholarship of Hacham Ovadia Yosef, a biography about the late Baghdad-born rabbi.

"I think what motivates me is a combination of everything: family, what Sephardic Judaism could offer to the world. [The Sephardic voice] is lacking. People are always are always preached to by Chabad, there is so much reform within Conservative Judaism, and we don't often hear about Sephardic Judaism. It has a lot to offer simply because... it offers a balanced way of life," Azoulay said.

But writing books is not where it ends for Azoulay. Earlier this year, for the first time in Canadian history, an official delegation of 30 Sephardic community leaders, activists, philanthropists and spiritual leaders visited Parliament Hill and met with the prime minister, ambassadors and other dignitaries.

Looking forward, Azoulay said he plans to head back to Ottawa to meet with Defence Minister Jason Kenney to inquire about security grants for Sephardic community institutions, as well as obtain a PhD in Sephardic studies and continue to write books and lecture about his cultural heritage. ■

ELI BATALION

Web comedy in the mamaloshen

Actors Eli Batalion and Jamie Elman finally found a practical use last year for the Yiddish they learned at Bialik High School in Montreal. They created and starred in YidLife Crisis, an irreverent web comedy series – in the mamaloshen.

Batalion, 35, and Elman, 38, play, respectively, the uptight Leizer and impish Chaimie, who tangle over the relevance of Judaism today while munching their way through treif in Mile End's eateries, starting with a famous poutinerie.

They pack a lot of humour and food for thought into the four 5- or 6-minute episodes, subtitled in English (and now French), which were released between Rosh Hashanah and Chanukah.

They believe they are expressing their generation's conflicts about their Jewish identity, and contributing to better understanding between Jews and other Quebecers.

They call YidLife their "love letter to Yiddish language, culture and comedy," which has influenced much of modern American humour.

"We were trying to imagine what conversational Yiddish would be like today for secular Jews, if it had not been wiped out by the Holocaust," Elman said.

With YidLife's surprising success, the pair is now planning to film another similar series this summer.

Elman, who has lived in Los Angeles for 15 years, has had roles in such TV shows as Student Bodies, American Dreams and Curb Your Enthusiasm, and in film, most recently, in the 2013 Saving Lincoln.

Batalion, who divides his time between Montreal and Toronto, is also a composer and has used his talents in his Montreal Fringe Festival show with Jerome Sable, Job: The Hip-Hop Musical, and in his feature-length horror/comedy musical movie Stage Fright, which came out last year. ■

RISA ALYSON COOPER

Judaism and environmentalism united

Environmentalism and Judaism intersect in many ways, and Risa Alyson Cooper, executive director of Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs, a non-profit that works to respond to contemporary food and ecological issues, said her organization is a prime example of that.

"In the Torah, it says that HaShem finished creating the world and took Adam, the first human being and told him... to work the land and protect the land," Cooper said.

"And we definitely see the work we do at Shoresh as honouring that dual mitzvah of working the land – using it to provide our food – and protecting the land, growing everything organically and making sure that we are creating habitat spaces for native pollinators."

In the six years since Cooper founded Shoresh's Kavanah Garden, at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, Ont., she's been working to expand its programming and reach.

In addition to offering educational and hands-on programs, workshops and events and producing more than 500 pounds of vegetables each season for community members in need, Shoresh has recently developed a rural centre at Bela Farm, a 100-acre farm in Hillsburgh, Ont., an hour northwest of Toronto.

Cooper, 33, has a master's in contemporary Jewish environmental ethics. She's excited about a new project that has Shoresh managing beehives to produce local, Jewish-grown honey.

She said they also hope to offer local, organic matzah, herbal teas, pickled products and organic horseradish for Pesach.

"We're also scaling up our food production, both at Kavanah and Bela. We're thinking about how we can affect the issue of hunger relief in a real and meaningful way," Cooper said. ■

MAHARAT RACHEL KOHL FINEGOLD

Carving out a new role for women

Maharat Rachel Kohl Finegold, 34, a member of the clergy at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal, was one of the first three graduates of a new modern Orthodox yeshiva that ordains women.

The Brooklyn, N.Y., native was appointed director of education and spiritual enrichment at the Shaar, a congregation of more than 1,400 families, in August 2013, two months after completing the four-year program at Yeshivat Maharat in the Bronx, N.Y., founded by Rabbi Avi Weiss.

The ordination of women, even at a level beneath the rabbinate, has been controversial in the Orthodox movement, including its liberal wing. (Maharat is a Hebrew acronym denoting a female leader in Torah, spirituality and religious law.)

Maharat Kohl Finegold downplays any trailblazing role and insists the duties entrusted to a maharat are in keeping with Halachah.

"I'm not really changing anything," she said, "it just looks different. There may have been skeptics at the beginning, but people see that I am deeply Orthodox... and not trying to make a statement or waves, or be the token woman."

She is qualified to determine halachic issues, teach Torah, officiate at life-cycle events, and provide spiritual and pastoral counselling.

She prefers to be addressed simply as Maharat Rachel (pronounced the Hebrew way).

Most of her work at the Shaar has been spent in education, including overseeing the synagogue's supplemental schools, developing programming for youth, and engaging with young families.

Maharat Kohl Finegold was previously education and ritual director at Chicago's Anshe Sholom B'nai Israel Congregation.

She and husband, Rabbi Avi Finegold, a Montrealer, have three young children. ■

DALIA KRUSNER

An advocate for youth leading youth

At 24, Dalia Krusner, executive director of Heart to Heart, a program that aims to address the divide between Israeli Jews and Palestinians, understands the value of youth leadership.

"I am a big advocate of youth leading youth, youth leadership and the power of youth," said Krusner, who also works at Ve'ahavta as its youth leadership manager.

"I've had a lot of experience with Israel and Palestine in many different ways. It is something I've studied in school and I've lived in Israel for various short periods of my life... This is one of the only things I've experienced that has given me hope and some idea of how to move forward."

Founded in 2011, Heart to Heart is a program born out of a partnership between Hashomer Hatzair/Camp Shomria in Canada and the Givat Haviva Education Foundation in Israel, an Israeli non-profit organization dedicated to promoting equality, and co-operation among Israelis.

Each summer, a group of 20 14-year-old Israelis – half of whom are Jewish and half of whom are Palestinian – fly to Canada and spends about three weeks together at Camp Shomria in Perth, Ont.

Krusner grew up in Toronto and was involved with Camp Shomria and Hashomer Hatzair, which she said was a big influence on her Jewish identity.

She was deeply influenced as a former Camp Shomria camper, and said one of the most rewarding parts of her work with Heart to Heart is seeing how quickly the campers grow.

"Seeing that massive transformation and how they treat each other and how they interact with the world in just three weeks [is rewarding]," she said. ■

AARON ROTENBERG

Approaching Judaism with intention

Aaron Rotenberg believes there's merit to stepping out of one's comfort zone, and that Judaism can be approached through a variety of lenses, including art, sustainability and social justice.

The Thornhill native, 28, is one of five friends who came together in November 2013 to found The Orchard, an intentional Jewish home in downtown Toronto.

It's an undertaking that Rotenberg, who's doing a master's in film production at York University, said he conceives of as "an experiment in pluralism and diversity."

Driven by a desire to foster a strong, inclusive downtown Jewish community, the house members come from a range of Jewish backgrounds, and Rotenberg said they're constantly engaged in conversation about how they want to live as a house, but also, how to "have influence that radiates outwards, serve as a model and bring other people in."

Currently, The Orchard hosts a monthly Shabbat service and dinner and holds events on some Jewish holidays, like a ninth of Adar session on constructive conflict, a Purim party and an annual Chanukah party, replete with live klezmer and a Jewish henna ceremony.

They're also planning an art beit midrash program, to explore the intersection between Judaism and artistic practice.

"It feels like there's a mix of people who come to our events, those who lean on the more religious end, those who lean on the more secular end and all the permutations in between," Rotenberg said.

"There's so many different ways to engage in Judaism...I think that's part of what we're trying to offer." ■

RABBI AARON LEVY

Serving Toronto's downtown community

When Rabbi Aaron Levy founded Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism to meet the needs of Toronto's growing Jewish community, he said he had no idea what it would become.

But today, the 39-year-old Maryland native who lives just outside of Kensington Market with his wife and two boys, said he's thrilled that Makom "has grown tremendously."

Makom, founded in 2009, is a grassroots community that works to build Jewish life in Toronto and create an "inclusive and diverse space, committed to Jewish learning, arts and culture, spirited prayer and ritual, and social and environmental activism." Services are held at the historic Kiever shul in Kensington Market.

Rabbi Levy, an educator on a variety of topics including environmentalism, spirituality, pluralism, social justice and even percussion, said the programing is geared toward people of all ages, all denominations and orientations.

"One of the things that has enabled Makom to reach such a wide spectrum of Jews is the diversity of our programming, and especially in the past year or so, we've really amped up our programming for families with children," he said.

"We're into our fourth year of running our five-day-a-week, after-school Hebrew immersion and pluralistic Jewish learning program called Downtown Jewish Playschool."

There are two locations – one at College Street and Spadina Avenue, another near Bathurst Street and Davenport Road – and there are plans to open a third location next year in the Annex.

"I'm excited for the ever-increasing vibrancy of downtown Jewish life and I'm thrilled that Makom is very much a part of that and I'd like to see that keep growing," Rabbi Levy said ■

YAEL MACHTINGER

Taking an academic approach to agunot

Yael Machtinger, 28, wants to enlighten Toronto's Jewish community and tell them that, even in 2015, there are women who are chained to their husbands (agunot) and who do not have a religious divorce (get).

"Get refusal is the ultimate form of domestic abuse," the PhD candidate in socio-legal studies at York University said. "In interviewing dozens of women [who are agunot], there isn't one woman who hasn't suffered some other form of abuse in her marriage."

Machtinger has become an expert on the controversial area of agunot, speaking about the problem at both academic and community events.

Her thesis compares the situations in Toronto and New York and finds that women in New York generally fare better in the religious court, which has endorsed prenuptial agreements, while the Toronto beit din has not.

Machtinger, who grew up in Toronto, fell into the study of agunot by chance when she studied the marriage laws of different religions, in a class on legal pluralism.

What started as a "little term paper," grew to become a doctoral dissertation.

"It's become an explicit goal [of mine] to put the stories of women at the centre of academic analysis," she said.

In her fifth (and "hopefully final") year of her PhD, Machtinger hopes her work will be published as a book or a series of scholarly articles and that she lands a job as a professor.

"Every time I try to move on, it pulls me back. This is an issue I'm totally passionate about." ■

SARAH LAZAROVIC

Tackling the news unconventionally

Sarah Lazarovic's portfolio is so diverse that even she has a hard time explaining to people what she does for a living.

"I don't have a single focus... This year I'm considered a journalist, maybe next year an artist. I consider myself an artist/journalist. I do a bit of everything... I kind of let the projects guide what I'm going to be defined as," said Lazarovic, a 35-year-old Montreal-born, Florida-raised illustrator, writer and filmmaker who moved to Toronto in 2003.

"I think most people think of me as a comics person. It's kind of what I'm known for."

As a "visual journalist," Lazarovic won an Ontario Newspaper Award for a sketch diary piece for Maclean's about then Toronto mayor Rob Ford's speech to the Economic Club of Canada.

"I try to tackle the news in an unconventional way," she said.

Having published a graphic essay late last year titled A Bunch of Pretty Things I Did Not Buy, Lazarovic is busy writing a proposal for her next book while doing a journalism fellowship at the University of Toronto.

"My first book was getting people to think about why they buy what they buy and how they can buy a little bit less, so my next book is building upon that and how to be a little bit more active, an active citizen," Lazarovic said.

"My next book will still be illustrated and funny but it will have a little... more girth when it comes to putting these ideas into practice when it comes to consuming less." ■

DANNY RICHMOND

Helping youths pursue social justice

Danny Richmond, 29, wants to ensure that young Jews interested in effecting positive change in the world are equipped with the appropriate tools, be it through education or direct opportunities to take action.

The Toronto native has spent over a decade working in youth leadership, community mobilization and international development.

At 24, he was one of 30 young leaders from across North America and the United Kingdom to be a fellow at the Tony Blair Faith Foundation, and through the program he worked to build interfaith co-operation in Toronto and develop a national campaign for malaria prevention.

Two years ago, Richmond brought his passion for social justice to the Jewish charity Ve'ahvata, where he founded a department of youth leadership and became its director. In this role, he helps facilitate a range of programs designed to engage young Jews in community-building and global citizenship. The department is currently developing workshops directed at Jewish day schools, youth and bar/bat mitzvah groups, which will address issues of poverty, social inclusion and homelessness.

It's also working to integrate aboriginal history and education into Jewish day school curricula.

"I think a lot of our Jewish institutions have spent time building a strong community," Richmond said, "but it can sometimes seem like we only interact with the wider world when we feel threatened...We'll talk about poverty, but it'll only be Jewish poverty.

"I'd rather see a discussion around poverty in general being a Jewish issue, whether or not the poor people are Jewish...We need to widen our circle of responsibility." ■

RACHEL ROSENBLUTH

'Neo-Chassid' seeks to make prayer joyful

Toronto-born Rachel Rosenbluth, says a challenge facing many young Jews today is finding ways of being Jewish that feel meaningful, relevant and spiritual.

"I think for a lot of us, Judaism is about culture or amazing traditions or family, but we end up turning to yoga, meditation or Buddhism for spirituality, for living lives more joyful and meaningful," the 25-year-old aspiring rabbi and self-described "neo-Chassid," said.

"For many of us, Judaism has a ton to offer, but we don't realize it."

Rosenbluth, who is currently studying at a yeshiva in Jerusalem and working towards getting smichah, is intent on sharing with others the elements of ecstatic prayer, mindfulness and contemplation, which she says are rooted in chassidic tradition, and the ways these can integrate into a "modern, progressive lifestyle."

A passion for farming and sustainable agriculture led her to serve, previously, as director of education at the Toronto non-profit Shoresh Jewish Environmental programs.

Currently splitting her time between Toronto and Israel, Rosenbluth has co-founded a beachside Tel Aviv minyan that includes dancing, singing and the option of traditional davening or seaside meditation.

Last year, she ran alternative Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation, in which she weaved textual study and meditation. "I see the chagim as tools for mindfulness," she explained, "for guiding us to be more self-aware and compassionate."

Rosenbluth's ultimate goal is to establish a centre for Jewish spirituality that leads "joyous, spirited Shabbatot, meditation, mindfulness... that sees Judaism as a path to stepping outside our egos and expanding consciousness." ■

JOSHUA DOLGIN

Performer fuses musical genres

Joshua Dolgin, also known by his stage name, Socalled, is tired of being asked whether he considers himself part of the Jewish community.

"[The assertion that I'm not], came from an interview I gave once, and the quote was totally taken out of context," the 38-year-old, Montreal-based rapper, singer, record producer and multi-disciplinary artist said.

Known for fusing hip-hop, klezmer and genres ranging from classical to folk, Dolgin has released five albums, is the subject of a National Film Board of Canada feature documentary and has collaborated with artists from an eclectic range of backgrounds and styles.

"I'm not religious or affiliated with a particular synagogue," Dolgin clarified. "But if you look at my career, I'm constantly performing in every Jewish music festival around the world, I've collaborated with Jewish artists, made Jewish-themed records."

He fell in love with hip hop in high school, he said, but "happened upon" klezmer 10 years later, while rummaging through old records at the Salvation Army. "I started to find all this Yiddish theatre music, cantorial music... this culture that was lost and forgotten," he said.

Dolgin stressed the Jewish community is too heterogeneous to paint with one brush, and that he's unable to answer the oft-posed query, What do Jews think of you? "If I play an instrumental Yiddish beat with someone rapping on top of it," he said, "maybe a traditional Jew from Poland won't like it, but they might when I sing a traditional song by a Yiddish folk singer... It's all about the audience, the platform." ■

TAMARA KRAMER

Journalist makes cool shtetl radio

For Montrealer Tamara Kramer, what started seven years ago as a goal to produce "one hour of cool radio, on a regular basis" has evolved into a personal exploration of what it means to be simultaneously Jewish and part of the greater world.

The 38-year-old journalist developed Shtetl on the Shortwave, a bi-weekly Jewish arts and culture radio program she produces and hosts, after a slot opened at Montreal community station CKUT for Jewish content of a "young, progressive, 'cool'" quality.

Kramer said the show and its accompanying online magazine broach the question: "How do you have all your identities fit together? For example, your social activism, love of music and being Jewish?"

Through the lens of art, culture and especially music, Shtetl examines everything from Jewish-Arab relations to the intersection between secular Jews and Chassidim, workers' rights to gender politics.

Shtetl aspires to a highly inclusive vision of Judaism, and Kramer's interview subjects are accordingly diverse, including non-Jews, Palestinians, rabbis, politicians, activists and people across the political spectrum.

By featuring viewpoints not often heard in mainstream Jewish spaces, Kramer hopes listeners access a broader sense of "what Jewish culture and community could be, and is.

"For many Jewish people I know, there's an alienation from Jewish life and culture," she said, "But especially from religion. There's this tendency to throw out the baby with the bathwater… But I also see this push to do meaningful, cool stuff around food, history, ecology – all these things young hipsters are into – but from a Jewish perspective." ■

STEPHAN OUAKNINE

Entrepreneur focuses on clean-tech

Stephan Ouaknine is a risk-taker. Calculated risks to be sure and risks that offer handsome payoffs if they pan out, but risks nevertheless.

Or as he puts it, "I like to go toward a burning building while others are running away."

Ouaknine, a Montreal-based entrepreneur with an impressive record of launching successful telecom startups, is banking on continued technological innovation to bring down the costs for alternative energy sources.

Inerjys, the company he founded and manages, is developing and marketing technology solutions for clean and sustainable energy, such as wind, solar and "the next generation of hydro."

Given that governments around the world are cutting back on subsidies, there is more than a little risk involved in financing them. His solution to making sustainable energy pay? Invest in companies that reduce the cost of energy and in the projects where it will be applied.

Creating commercial opportunities is something Ouaknine has been doing since he was a kid.

"I was born with a feeling of entrepreneurship," he said. "I've always like to build things, since I was a kid – forts in the snow or Lego [structures]."

A graduate of McGill University, he moved to Israel and was part of "start-up nation," the name given to the country's entrepreneurial high-tech sector.

"I cut my teeth in Israel. It has the best combination of engineering talent and guts," he said.

Israeli entrepreneurs challenge the status quo and believe they can do things better than others around the world, he said.

Ouaknine uses those skills to develop technological solutions to energy demands. It's a bit risky, he acknowledged, "but there is no zero risk. We've created a vehicle that takes just the right amount of risk, but mitigates it." ■

JASON ROSENBLATT

Artist embraces diversity of Jewish music

One of Jason Rosenblatt's claims to fame is his virtuosity on the diatonic harmonica. He can coax music that ranges from klezmer to bluegrass to jazz out of this humble instrument.

But Rosenblatt, 41, is also an accomplished pianist, composer and producer, devoted to bringing Jewish music to a wide audience. He is an exponent of "the new Jewish music." Rosenblatt is the former artistic director of KlezKanada, the week-long summer camp in the Laurentians where hundreds from around the world annually converge to enjoy traditional and not-so-traditional eastern European Jewish music.

Rosenblatt, who divides his time between Montreal and Philadelphia, is a "graduate" of KlezKanada, a scholarship recipient in 1998. Four years later, he founded the band Shtreiml, of which he remains musical director. It is renowned for his original blues/rock-infused arrangements of klezmer music, with a dash of Turkish music. His wife Rachel Lemisch is the trombonist.

Shtreiml has played throughout North America and Europe. Rosenblatt also heads Jump Babylon, a newer band that has a rock/country vibe.

In 2010, Rosenblatt spearheaded the first Montreal Jewish Music Festival, now an annual event, with support from Federation CJA's Generations Fund, the Azrieli Foundation and others.

"I define Jewish music by a fairly narrow definition, but one that allows for a broad range of styles," he said. He considers language and lyrics, but especially the melody. "Even if the style is jazz, bluegrass, African beat or funk, at the core, all of this music has a melody that is Jewish."

Rosenblatt's goal is to present the diversity of Jewish music by leading artists at venues that will attract people of all origins and ages. ■

SARA ANGEL

The business of Nazi-looted art

By the time Sara Angel finishes her doctoral dissertation next year, she will have compiled a unique handbook on how to restitute Nazi-looted art.

Angel, 45, a journalist and art historian, became fascinated by the story of Max Stern, a Jewish art dealer whose art collection was sold at a forced auction in Dusseldorf, Germany, in 1937. About a dozen works of art have been recovered by his estate.

Stern was interned when he arrived in Canada in 1940, but he became a renowned dealer in Montreal, representing Emily Carr among other artists.

Angel was working on a different topic for her PhD, but she wrote a magazine article on Stern and the project to restitute his collection. She changed her topic midstream to examine the problems of Nazi-looted art.

"I'm using the Max Stern Restitution Project as a case study in order to look at how different countries are looking at restituting art," she said. "Every country has a different way of dealing with it. There has not yet been created one standardized, global policy."

In some cases, artwork has been returned to heirs because of moral suasion, in other cases there has been considerable litigation, she says.

As the founding director of the Art Canada Institute, an organization based at University of Toronto's Massey College, dedicated to the promotion of Canadian art history, she also wants to raise awareness about Stern.

"Max Stern was an amazing Jewish-Canadian hero. His legacy will have an impact on restitution studies around the world." ■

Is U.S.-Israel crisis a sign of long-term conflict?

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and President Barack Obama at the White House in 2013

RON KAMPEAS
JTA WASHINGTON

U.S. President Barack Obama's refusal to accept Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's ostensible recommitment to a two-state solution to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has watchers of the U.S.-Israel relationship wondering if the recent crisis is a mere speed bump or a sign of a deeper shift in ties between the countries.

Netanyahu moved quickly last week to emphasize that his statement on the eve of his re-election that no Palestinian state would be established on his watch did not represent a policy shift away from a two-state solution. But Obama administration officials were unwilling to accept that clarification, a point the president emphasized in a press conference on March 22 when he said that differences with Israel were "substantive" and not easily papered over.

"The central question is whether this is a temporary blip on the radar screen or whether there's something deeper and more structural going on," said David Harris, the American Jewish Committee's executive director. "We have to know the answer to that in order to know whether we can put the U.S.-Israel train back on track, as we all would like."

Along with other Jewish organizational leaders and pro-Israel lawmakers, Harris has been urging the White House to tone down its rhetoric in recent days, but Obama's comments last week – his most detailed on the rift since the Israeli election – suggest the administration is not heeding those warnings.

"I have conveyed to the White House that it's time to cool it," Representative Nita Lowey, the top Democrat on the House Appropriations Committee, told JTA. "The U.S.-Israel relationship is based on shared values and an unbreakable bond, not on personalities."

Last Friday, Israel agreed to release tax revenues to the Palestinian Authority, a step several insiders had hoped to see as a goodwill gesture to help repair the rift with Washington. The State Department opposed Netanyahu's decision in January to suspend the transfers, a response to the Palestinian Authority's decision to join the International Criminal Court, which in turn opened the door to an examination of whether Israel has committed war crimes against the Palestinians.

Yet with Obama saying that a re-evaluation of U.S. policy is in the works, it's unclear whether such a gesture will be sufficient.

"I'm worried things get worse before they get better," said David Makovsky, until last year a member of Obama's Middle East negotiating team, and now an analyst at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

The crisis comes as another major bone of contention between Washington and Jerusalem, negotiations over Iran's nuclear program, neared a crucial threshold: the March 31 deadline for a framework agreement between Iran and the major powers.

Netanyahu's deep skepticism of those talks – particularly his fears of a so-called sunset clause that would limit the duration of restrictions on Iranian nuclear activity – led to his controversial speech before Congress earlier this month, which infuriated the White House.

"If the administration doesn't engage Israel over some of his concerns, Netanyahu will go the congressional route," Makovsky said.

It is the Palestinian issue, though, that now has Obama's attention. In a press conference last week, the president made clear that while security and intelligence co-operation between the countries would not be affected, he isn't about to let go of Netanyahu's pre-election rejection of a Palestinian state arising on his watch.

"This can't be reduced to a matter of somehow let's all hold hands and sing Kumbaya," Obama said.

"I am required to evaluate honestly how we manage Israeli-Palestinian relations over the next several years," Obama said. "Because up until this point, the premise has been both under Republican and Democratic administrations that as difficult as it was, as challenging as it was, the possibility of two states living side by side in peace and security could marginalize more extreme elements, bring together folks at the centre with some common sense and we could resolve what has been a vexing issue and one that is ultimately a threat to Israel as well. And that possibility seems very dim."

What the evaluation means precisely is not entirely clear. But the president would not count out a shift in diplomacy in international arenas, including possibly backing recognition of Palestinian statehood at the U.N. Security Council.

That would represent a major policy shift that has pro-Israel lawmakers worried.

Netanyahu expresses concern about Iran deal to U.S. senators

JTA
JERUSALEM

The framework deal on Iran's nuclear program is worse than Israeli leaders feared, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told his cabinet.

"This agreement, as it appears, confirms all of our concerns and even more so," Netanyahu said Sunday morning at the weekly cabinet meeting.

Netanyahu also said he had just come from a conversation with U.S. Sen. Mitch McConnell and that he had spoken over the weekend with Sen. Harry Reid.

"I heard from both of them about strong and continuing bipartisan support for Israel, and, of course, this is very important. I expressed to them our deep concern over the agreement being formulated with Iran in the nuclear talks," he said.

Netanyahu told the delegation of U.S. senators in Jerusalem that a proposed deal on curbing Iran's nuclear program "paves Iran's way to the bomb."

Netanyahu met on Sunday morning in Jerusalem with the delegation led by McConnell, the majority leader. Israeli Intelligence Minister Yuval Steinitz also attended the meeting.

"We are very much concerned for our common interests by the developments in the Middle East," Netanyahu told the senators, according to a statement issued by his office. "As we are speaking, Iran is rampaging through Yemen; it is conquering the Middle East. This is correctly seen by all the countries in the Middle East as a strategic move to dominate the region, and therefore we are witnessing something quite unprecedented.

"And as Israel and the Arab countries see Iran progressing with its aggression to conquer Yemen and the Bab el-Mandeb straits, talks continue as usual and go on, on a deal that from everything that we hear paves Iran's way to the bomb."

McConnell told Netanyahu that relations between the two countries remain strong.

OPINION

Why Netanyahu won again

Gerald Steinberg

Although the polls and pundits predicted defeat and opponents were rejoicing, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu emerged with a decisive victory in last month's election. In a bitter and exhausting campaign, Netanyahu was confronted by hostile journalists, including accusations that he and his wife had mismanaged their official residence. In the middle, he went to Washington to challenge U.S. President Barack Obama's policies on Iran, for which he was widely attacked, and returned to travel up and down Israel every day seeking support.

He also overcame the impact of millions in foreign money used for advertising, organizing mass rallies, and sending anti-Netanyahu activists door to door (a failed attempt to import American practice). But as he has done in the past, Netanyahu turned the attacks into weapons against his opponents. He understood that for many Israelis, including those who had differences with his policies and with his party, the images of blatant foreign manipulation were red flags. Although Netanyahu has his own foreign funders, their involvement was less visible.

The opposition, led by Isaac Herzog and Tzipi Livni, was more formidable than in previous elections. Their campaign focused on economic issues, such as the impossibly high cost of housing, and the vast gap between the well-paid middle class, including high-tech workers, and low-level workers earning a minimum wage and unable to support their families. A new party formed by Moshe Kahlon, who broke away from Likud over economic failures, emerged and gained traction.

But while Israelis talked economics, many again voted on the basis of security. In this dimension, Netanyahu trumped Herzog, who lacks experience and the image of strength seen as necessary to defend Israeli vital interests. Netanyahu benefited from the leadership he showed during the gruelling summer war in Gaza. For 51 days, through 4,563 rockets, terror tunnels, and 72 Israeli deaths, every one painful, Netanyahu was attacked from all sides. Coalition partners Naftali Bennett and Avigdor Liberman accused him of being too cautious and not crushing Hamas, while international pressure, primarily from the United States, constantly demanded ceasefire agreements that would leave Hamas with the capability to resume attacks at any time. But neither claim convinced Israelis who support Netanyahu's tough pragmatism in dealing with Hamas and responding to wider threats of terror, including on the Golan Heights along the Syrian border.

Herzog was careful to avoid the lofty rhetoric and promises of ideal peace that Israelis see as entirely unrealistic. But the Labor party, which added Livni's faction under the heading of the Zionist Union, remains associated in the public eye with the Oslo disaster. Livni's record added to these concerns, including her actions as foreign minister during the 2006 Lebanon war, which ended with a largely unenforced agreement and UN resolution pretending to disarm Hezbollah. The rotation agreement that would have made Livni prime minister after two years was viewed with great concern, and in the last days of the campaign, she declared that this agreement would not be implemented.

Ethnic, social and cultural factors (a form of Israeli class conflict) also remained important. The religious and traditional voters who make up the majority of Jewish Israelis continued their allegiance to the right of the Israeli political spectrum, not trusting or feeling comfortable with the secular or anti-religious westernized left. The money and campaign gimmicks (pizza and beer parties) that were imported, at great expense, from the United States, under the slogan "anybody but Bibi," added to this alienation.

In a marathon at the end, Netanyahu put all of these concerns together, convincing voters who do not trust Labor and the left to abandon the smaller parties and vote Likud. Against the odds, he won a fourth term as prime minister. Now, he must apply the intensity he showed in the campaign not only on Iran, Hamas, Syria and other external threats, but most importantly in seriously addressing the housing crisis and other core economic concerns. ■

U.S. needs to tone down, ADL's Foxman says

Last week, representatives Ed Royce and Eliot Engel, respectively the top Republican and Democrat on the House Foreign Affairs Committee, wrote to Samantha Power, the U.S. envoy to the United Nations, seeking assurances that the United States would continue to block resolutions critical of Israel.

"Only a solution negotiated directly between the Israelis and Palestinians can result in a lasting peace," the letter said. "We are seeking an assurance from you that the United States will veto resolutions at the United Nations that are biased and one-sided against Israel."

In an interview with JTA, Engel said it was critical to get beyond the current crisis.

"We need to move on," Engel said. "We need to emphasize the many close ties we have with Israel, we need to end recriminations and finger pointing."

Abraham Foxman, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, said Netanyahu's walk-back should be enough to move forward.

"The U.S. now has to climb off, climb down, tone down and find an opportunity to say something positive," Foxman said in an interview.

But Makovsky said the trip to Israel by Republican House Speaker John Boehner this week, could further inflame tensions.

"Boehner's visit to Israel is going to reframe this issue in partisan terms, when really, there should be a substantive critique of the Iran talks," Makovsky said.

Boehner slammed Obama's "reprehensible" relations with Netanyahu on Sunday.

"I think the animosity exhibited by our administration toward the prime minister of Israel is reprehensible," Boehner told CNN's State of the Union.

"And I think the pressure they've put on him over the last four or five years have frankly pushed him to the point where he had to speak up," he added. ■

Netanyahu also voices concern about Yemen

"I want to assure all Israelis that the U.S.-Israel relationship is still, no matter what's been said recently, in very, very strong shape on a bipartisan basis in the U.S. Congress. The group who are here share your concerns about this potential agreement, and there are options that the United States has in a wake of an agreement and if there is no agreement."

The United States and five other world powers (China, Russia, France, Great Britain and Germany), known as the P5+1, have set March 31 for reaching an agreement.

According to reports emerging as The CJN went to press, Iran has agreed to limit uranium-enriching centrifuges to 6,000 at its main nuclear site for at least 10 years, as well as running centrifuges at its underground Fordo nuclear site. Nuclear material may be produced for energy, science and medicine. The sites would be subject to international inspection, and no work could be done that would lead to a nuclear bomb.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry met early last Sunday morning in Lausanne, Switzerland, the site of the current talks, with his Iranian counterpart, Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif. Kerry cancelled a trip back to the United States, where he was to attend an event honouring the late senator Edward Kennedy, in order to remain at the talks.

At the cabinet meeting, Netanyahu also cited the takeover last week of large parts of Yemen by the Iran-allied Houthi militia.

"After the Beirut-Damascus-Baghdad axis, Iran is carrying out a pincers movement in the south as well in order to take over and conquer the entire Middle East," he said. "The Iran-Lausanne-Yemen axis is very dangerous for humanity and needs to be stopped." ■

IN THE SILENCE BETWEEN THE WORDS: THE ADULT CHILDREN OF DIVORCE

Family Matters

By

John Syrtash

B. A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 33 years

One of the tasks of true friendship is to listen compassionately and creatively to the hidden silences.
Often secrets are not revealed in words, they lie concealed in the silence between the words or in the depth of what is unsayable between two people.
– John O'Donohue (1956-2008) Irish poet, author, priest, and philosopher
From Anam Cara: A Book of Celtic Wisdom

Common sense informs most of you that Divorce hurts children of younger years for obvious reasons. Formerly, it was thought that breaking up a bad marriage was much better for children than waiting until they grew up, at least until they moved out. Long term studies, such as Judith Wallerstein's "Legacy of Divorce" have proven that in the absence of violent/abusive situations, this myth may be very problematic. Quite the opposite is true. Children of divorced parents have been shown to be at far greater risk of divorce themselves, criminal behaviour, substance abuse and other problems than those kids whose parents with troubled relationships who either stayed together or deferred separation until the children had move out permanently.

However, far fewer studies have been published on the effect of divorce on adult children. Children who have moved out or have "grown up" often suffer in silence when their parents separate. Although no longer living at home, many parents of such adult children forget the boundaries they taught their children by putting them "in the middle" of disputes arising from the separation or by using their children as shoulders on which to cry. Such behaviour often shatters an adult child's own sense of stability and identity with which he or she has identified all his/her life. That stability is based on the marriage that nurtured their very being and much of who they have become. By attempting to force such an adult child to take sides, offspring can develop an enormous degree of stress, leading to emotional problems and occasionally, stress in their own marriages. Sometimes such stress can be a factor leading to divorce with their own spouses. Moreover, in cases where an adult child has already been alienated when young by one parent against the other, such conduct by parents can further intensify such feelings of alienation.

So what to do? Is there such a thing as a healthy divorce?

In the quote above, Irish poet John O'Donohue describes what two friends mean to each other, how the secrets of friendship blossom "between the words." It means to "listen compassionately and creatively to the hidden silences." In a remarkable Shabbat morning speech, Rabbi Daniel Korobkin of Thornhill's BAYT schul recently remarked that it is between the words where one finds God. As applied to the adult children of divorce, I interpret such wisdom to mean that in order to protect your adult child's stability and sense of self-worth keep your mouth shut. No matter how close you may be to your kids and no matter how badly you want them as your "allies": don't. As difficult as this is to read, a child does not owe you any greater allegiance when you separate.

Your only comment? "Mom/Dad and I will work things out. That's all you need to know." And you say it even if your spouse fails to play by the same rules. Why? Because the silence between each of those words will be quietly understood as your gift of love as a parent, no different than the tuition or hockey fees or braces you paid so long ago, or maybe it was just those bedtime hugs and nighttime stories. It is "unsayable" because your silence is your expression of parental love and selflessness. The adult child will listen very intently to that silence. He or she will appreciate it more than you can imagine. Meanwhile go hire a professional therapist and lawyer to whom you should complain, not your adult child. Don't "parentify", be a parent.

Amnesty International says Hamas showed disregard for civilians

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

In a new report, Amnesty International said that armed groups in the Gaza Strip, including Hamas, displayed a "flagrant disregard for the lives of civilians" in Israel during last summer's 50-day conflict. The report also investigates one case in which a rocket fired by Hamas landed in a Palestinian refugee camp, killing 13 Palestinians, 11 of them children.

"Many thousands of rockets and missiles were indiscriminately launched into Israel and killed six civilians during that time," Kate Allen, the director of Amnesty International in the U.K. told The Media Line. "It was impossible for those armed groups to know where they would land, and they had no control over them. We're saying very clearly...that putting civilians at risk with those missiles and rockets is a war crime."

In previous reports, Amnesty International has sharply criticized Israel for its actions in Gaza, saying its air strikes could also constitute war crimes. The new report came just a few days before the Palestinians were set to join the International Criminal Court where they say they will push for war crimes charges against Israel for its conduct in Gaza. The Amnesty report is a reminder that Israel can level similar charges against Hamas.

In Israel, Amnesty International is seen as being overly critical of Israel, and some in Israel speculated that the organization was trying to even the score.

"Our traditional way of operating is that we cover abuses from all involved, here or anywhere else in the world," Allen said. "It is the case that the Israeli government is critical of Amnesty but when we talk about Hamas or other armed groups, we are not doing that in response to the criticism, we are doing it because it is important that abuses on all sides of the conflict are exposed and documented."

Amnesty International also cited "credible reports" that rockets were launched from within schools and at least one hospital.

A Hamas spokesman reacted angrily to the report, calling it "biased" and "full of lies," while Israeli officials welcomed it. Allen said Hamas had refused to co-operate, and Israel did not let Amnesty officials into Gaza, both of which made gathering information a challenge.

Some analysts in Israel said they did not believe the report went far enough in its condemnation of Hamas.

"We don't need a report to tell us that Hamas indiscriminately fires at civilians," Jonathan Rynhold, a professor of political science at Bar-Ilan University told The Media Line. "The report is too little and too late."

He said he would have been more impressed if the report had cited how hard Israel works to minimize civilian casualties, as compared to Hamas.

"I want to see real fair play," Rynhold said. "Israel is not above criticism, but I don't want to see a group that's weak [Hamas] being given a pass. In the past, Amnesty has singled out Israel and has not been proportionate in its criticism."

The report called on both Israel and Hamas to investigate their actions. ■

Olmert found guilty

On March 30, two-and-a-half years after he walked free, and seven months after the case was re-opened, Jerusalem District Court found former prime minister Ehud Olmert guilty in the so-called Talansky case, in which he was accused of accepting envelopes filled with money from American Jewish businessman Morris "Moshe" Talansky.

Boteach ad urges Obama not to appease Iran

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach

JTA
NEW YORK

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach published a full-page advertisement in the New York Times calling on U.S. President Barack Obama to refrain from appeasing Iran.

The ad, published March 28 by Rabbi Boteach's World Values Network foundation, comes as the United States and other world powers worked to achieve an interim deal on curbing Iran's nuclear program before a March 31 deadline.

Last month, Rabbi Boteach apologized for an ad in the same newspaper accusing National Security Adviser Susan Rice of turning a blind eye to genocide, calling it a "personal attack" rather than a policy disagreement. Most major Jewish organizations condemned the ad.

In the new ad, the words "Mr. President: Fighting Al Qaeda made you like Churchill. Appeasing Iran will make you like Chamberlain," appear with a photo of a determined-looking Obama. Superimposed over part of the Obama portrait is a reproduction of a Times newspaper article from Sept. 30, 1938, detailing the signing of the Munich Agreement, which allowed the Nazis to annex portions of Czechoslovakia, which became known as the Sudetenland.

The ad calls on Obama not to sign a deal with Iran until its supreme leader, Ali Hosseini Khamenei, renounces "all genocidal threats against Israel" and Iran ceases its support of terror around the world. Also, the ad says, Obama must not sign a deal that contains a one-year weapons breakout period for Iran.

"Don't allow Iran to become a nuclear power," the ad concludes. ■

White supremacist pleads not guilty in JCC killings

JTA
KANSAS CITY

Frazier Glenn Miller has pleaded not guilty to charges that he murdered three people outside two Kansas City-area Jewish institutions.

Miller, 74, entered the plea on March 27 in the U.S. District Court in Johnson County, Kansas. He asked for a speedy trial, within 150 days, despite objections from his lawyers, Reuters reported.

Judge Thomas Kelly Ryan set an Aug. 17 trial date. The judge denied Miller's request for Internet access while he is in jail awaiting trial.

Earlier this month, the judge ruled that there was enough evidence to try Miller, who also goes by the name Frazier Glenn Cross Jr., for the April 13, 2014 murders – two in the parking lot of the Jewish Community Center of Greater Kansas City in Overland Park, Kan., and one in the parking lot at Village Shalom, a Jewish assisted-living facility a few blocks away.

In addition to capital murder, Miller is charged with three counts of attempted first-degree murder, one count of aggravated assault and one count of criminal discharge of a weapon at a structure.

State prosecutors have said they will seek the death penalty.

Miller, a former Ku Klux Klan grand dragon, told the Kansas City Star that he began planning the attacks when he became so sick with emphysema that he thought he would die soon and that he conducted reconnaissance missions of the JCC and Village Shalom in the days before the shootings.

"I wanted to make damned sure I killed some Jews or attacked the Jews before I died," he told the newspaper.

None of his victims was Jewish. ■

We need a coalition that unites all Israelis

Words. On the surface, campaigns and elections are about words, and much attention has been given to the words that were spoken. The clearest words were spoken at the ballot box, as Israelis clearly articulated who they wanted as the next prime minister. Many words were also spoken during the campaign. Hurtful words, angry words, aggressive words, arrogant words, and even racist words.

As Jews we believe that sticks and stones will break our bones, and words will harm us more. That said, the culture of political discourse has denigrated to such a level that a free pass has essentially been given to politicians. For the sake of victory, they are allowed to say anything, with the comfort of knowing that they will not be held accountable for their words.

When viewed from this context, while esthetically repulsed, I am neither shocked nor overly disappointed by the polluting words spoken during the campaign by our politicians in general and our prime minister in particular. Many of these words simply reflected their commitment to win.

Herein, however, lies a problem that must shock us into immediate action. Even if the words that were spoken were "merely" words, these words worked. They may not have represented the true beliefs of those who used them, but they did convince the population to vote because of them. The words say less about our politicians and more about us and what we have become.

Why does an "us-them" dichotomy between Israeli Jewish and Arab citizens motivate people to vote? Why does a campaign which designates half of Israeli society as outside the true Zionist camp inspire? What does it say about us when a leading party campaigns under the slogan, "No more apologies," as if loyalty to Israel entails an assumption of its infallibility? What does it say about the way our society understands Judaism, when under its banner we advocate for inequality and xenophobia? What does it say about the value of peace and justice in our society, when rejecting a two-state solution outright, regardless of the circumstances, makes a candidate more rather than less attractive?

A common mantra over the last decade has been that Israeli society has rejected both the right and the left and moved to the centre. But one of the clear lessons of this election is that this is no longer true. At the very least, 30 per cent – if not more – of Israel's Jewish citizens have adopted beliefs about Judaism and nationalism antithetical to core principles of liberal democracy and modern Judaism.

Israel has spoken, and it's time to speak back. As Israelis and as Jews, we must understand we are in the midst of a cultural battle over the soul of our people, our country, and our tradition. This battle will not be won with words or by imposing policies which our citizens have rejected.

'We are in the midst of a battle over the soul of our people'

This is not a battle between U.S. President Barack Obama and Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. It is not a battle which will be won in the political arena, but an educational battle over the ideas and ideals which define who we are, who we want to be, and the democratic nature and moral fibre of the homeland of the Jewish people.

Is Judaism a religion which believes that the equal treatment of all Israeli citizens regardless of their religious, racial, gender, and national identities – is the ultimate expression of the biblical idea that all humanity is created in the image of God? Is Judaism a religion which believes that if our legitimate security concerns can be met, our commitment to justice and equality must override our commitment to holding on to all of the Land of Israel? Is Judaism the maid-servant to nationalism, or rather its greatest critic, challenging it to ever-higher moral heights?

Is the Jewish idea of Chosen People one that fosters a false sense of superiority, self-aggrandizement, and alienation from the world, or is it an idea that challenges us to be more, and obligates us to engage and contribute to the betterment of our world? Is Judaism a religion where one truth monopolizes God's word, or are we a tradition where "these and these are the words of the living God"? Is Judaism a religion that embraces and incorporates the best of modernity, or do we believe that the more insulated we are, the more authentically Jewish we are?

> Is Judaism a religion that embraces and incorporates the best of modernity or do we believe that the more insulated we are, the more authentically Jewish we are?

A coalition is now being formed which represents the voice of the people. We need to create a new coalition which will speak to the people, and which will work to reclaim a place for a modern, moral, and liberal Judaism at the heart of Israel.

Good people, intelligent people, can reach different conclusions about many of the most contentious issues facing Israeli society. To believe that a two-state solution is not implementable today given the current political conditions does not entail a denial of the values of justice and equality. However, to cease to aspire toward it, and to undermine its possibility to be actualized one day through policies and legislation, does entail a marginalization of these values.

To believe that the Middle East is a dangerous place, and that the strengthening of Israel is a national priority, is a reflection of the highest values of our tradition. However, to believe that these interests are served by seeing Judaism and democracy, and loyalty to Jews and a commitment to equality for all, as zero-sum games, is to adopt the lowest values of our tradition.

We need a new coalition whose aim is to educate, a coalition that unites people from across party lines, which unites Jews and Arabs, which transcends traditional right-wing, left-wing distinctions, which combines Israel and world Jewry. The people have spoken. It is time for this new coalition to begin the slow educational work of speaking to the people and fighting for the soul of Israel. ■

Opera comes to a famed Jerusalem market

LINDA GRADSTEIN
JERUSALEM

The only singing usually heard in the crowded alleyways of the Machane Yehuda fruit and vegetable market is that of vendors yelling out competing prices for cucumbers. But on a recent afternoon, costumed performers belted out arias from The Elixir of Love by Donizetti, as well as Mozart's Don Giovanni.

The event was a plug for an upcoming opera festival in Jerusalem, and meant to broaden opera's reach beyond the well-heeled, and often elderly, crowd that frequents the Israeli Opera House in Tel Aviv.

"Opera is the most accessible and wonderful art form that exists," Michael Eisenstadt, the artistic administrator of the opera said. "A lot of people hear the word opera and shriek or turn away because they have all kinds of misconceptions."

The crowd at the market was appreciative, especially when the soloists brought them into the action. At one point, Tal Bergman, dressed as a soldier, serenaded an elderly woman, tenderly cradling her head at the end of the song, as many in the crowd smiled.

"Who's that?" one observer asked her neighbour. "That's not one of our uniforms," she added worriedly.

Soloist Alla Vasilevitsky moved to Israel seven years ago from a region of the former Soviet Union that borders on China. She says she hopes that more Israelis will learn to like opera.

"We want people to like opera and to connect with it," she said.

The audience seemed appreciative, applauding after each song, and taking selfies with the performers.

"It was beautiful, very beautiful," Adar Acrech, a Canadian tourist said. "It's nice to be part of the culture here and experience something beautiful."

Her daughter Gabriella said it was her first time hearing live opera.

"I loved it," she breathed, her eyes shining.

Shopper Ilana Kattani said she had made a last-minute decision to come to the market, famed for its colourful fruits and vegetables alongside stalls selling nuts, olives, and spices.

"I'm really glad I came today," she said. "I enjoyed it and I think most people did."

Opera artistic director Eisenstadt said he had some trepidation about bringing the young soloists to the market.

"People were a little skeptical, but you could see that once they started singing everyone was captivated," he said.

Some of the vendors in the market said they felt more captive than captivated by the performance.

One owner, who did not want to be quoted, said he couldn't wait for the performers to move away from his store, and that he had lost business after shoppers turned to other stalls.

But others said they were glad for the diversion.

"This music isn't my style – I like Mizrachi (Oriental music)," Yakir Yaacobi said as he reorganized his pistachio nuts to the tune of an Israeli pop singer. "But people here seemed to enjoy it." ■

THEREFORE CHOOSE LIFE, NEW PLAY BY KATHY KACER

A letter from the past poses a heartbreaking dilemma for Holocaust survivor Joseph, the protagonist of a new play by author-playwright Kathy Kacer and her son, actor Jake Epstein, both of Toronto. The letter is from Joseph's first and true love, Chava, whom he thought had perished in the Holocaust. Joseph must decide whether to stay with his wife of 25 years and their son, or to return to his former love.

That is the essential plotline of Therefore Choose Life, which the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company is presenting later this month with co-playwright Epstein taking the role of the son; it also features actors Sheila McCarthy and Avery Saltzman, the company's co-artistic director. The play's director is Rachel Slaven.

Kacer is the award-winning author of more than a dozen books for young readers that focus on stories of World War II and the Holocaust. Slaven is a Canadian director based in Toronto and New York. Therefore Choose Life previews April 18 to 22 and runs April 23 to May 10 in the HGJTC's new home, the Greenwin Theatre, Toronto Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. Tickets $25 to $67. www.hgjewishtheatre.com or 1-855-985-2787.

When the late Israeli film producer-director Micha Shagrir donated a rare 350-year-old Tanach to the University of Haifa Library, librarians were amazed to discover that a near-duplicate copy of the book was already in the library's possession.

Printed in Frankfurt in 1677, the volume came to be reunited with its twin in a circuitous way. A month after Egyptian president Anwar Sadat visited Israel in 1977, Shagrir and other Israelis made a secret trip to Egypt. In Cairo, he met an antique book dealer of Armenian descent who had admired a film Shagrir had produced about the Armenian genocide. The dealer gave Shagrir a wrapped copy of a book, but made him promise not to open it until he returned to Israel. When Shagrir returned and opened the package, he was stunned to find the ancient volume. Shagrir, who gave the Tanach to the university in 2014, died recently at the age of 77.

A ground-breaking study of Jewish-run taverns in Poland

BILL GLADSTONE
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Despite various expulsions, evictions and repressive tax measures meant to force them out of business, Jewish-run taverns were a ubiquitous presence in Poland from roughly the 17th to the late 19th centuries. Polish historians have often underestimated the curious staying power of these persistent relics of Poland's feudal society. To paraphrase Mark Twain, reports of their demise were greatly exaggerated. While some historians had asserted that many of the taverns had faded out by the 1850s, evidence shows they were still operating years and decades later in the same places where they had been supposedly shut down.

American scholar Glenn Dynner, author of a groundbreaking new study on the subject, went far beyond the usual government documents relied upon by earlier historians, which, he says, were "often merely a gauge of official aspirations." His sources include traveller's memoirs, court documents, petitions, early newspapers, obscure records of civic and criminal matters, and scenes from Polish and Yiddish literature. (Evidently, Jewish tavern-keepers were stock figures and their premises were stock locales in 19th-century Polish romantic literature.)

This diverse spectrum of viewpoints is what brings Dynner's book to life. Although scholarly, Yankel's Tavern: Jews, Liquor, & Life in the Kingdom of Poland makes for fascinating reading, particularly if you are among the many modern Jews whose ancestors were tavern-keepers. Apparently, selling liquor was once as common a profession among Jacob's children as tailoring. While never part of a global chain, Jewish-run drinking establishments were almost the Starbucks or Second Cups of pre-modern Polish society.

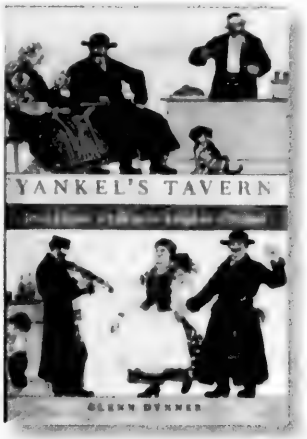
Prevalent across eastern Europe in the 19th century, liquor-serving roadhouses run by Yankel and his cousins were especially prolific in the Kingdom of Poland during most of the partition era (1772 to 1918). According to some first-hand accounts cited by Dynner, the phenomenon was already well established in the early 1700s. "All the towns, large and small, are filled with nobody but Jews, who also run the village breweries, roadside taverns, and inns, so that our Poland is more like Jerusalem than a Polish state," observed Polish chronicler Stefan Garczynski in 1754.

An integral social institution, the taverns served a clientele of mostly Polish peasants and were typically owned by nobles who turned over their management to Jews. Every major crossroads of every village and town had at least one such establishment, which typically became the centre of local social life, hospitality, business, leisure, even religious celebrations.

At the beginning of the partition era, the leases to about 85 per cent of all taverns in Poland were in Jewish hands and well over a third of Jewish families were engaged in tavern-keeping, Dynner estimates. In 1808, there were nearly 20,000 registered taverns in the Duchy of Warsaw alone, of which more than 13,000 were in villages.

"As any traveller through partitioned Poland knew, a tavern was more than a tavern," he writes. "It often constituted a bar, distillery, country store, hotel, stable, post office, and bank wrapped into one. Like the famed caravansary found along the Silk Road, it supported the flow of commerce, news, and people. It was frequently the sole entertainment venue within miles and the only place that one could take care of problems incurred on the roads. . . ."

The Poles had a love-hate relationship with the taverns, just as they did with the Jews: the former were periodically condemned as a source of spiritual pollution and the latter were often blamed for the epidemic of peasant drunkenness that assailed the populace. Polish bureaucrats seemed perennially obsessed over the decades with finding ways to impose fees, restrictions, partial bans, outright prohibitions and expulsions.



Yankel's Tavern: Jews, Liquor, & Life in the Kingdom of Poland.
By Glenn Dynner
Oxford University Press, 2014

The Tavern Leczynski St Lublin, 1867.

Dynner uses some newly-discovered archival material to show that, despite these harsh measures, a vibrant and equally persistent "counter-narrative" kicked in to keep the taverns alive and in a condition of healthy fluidity. The nobles, who preferred Jewish operators for their reliability, often helped them circumvent the regulations. Referring to this close level of co-operation as the "lord-Jew alliance," Dynner shows that nobles frequently helped their Jewish tavern operators install Christians as fronts for their operations.

Several years ago, when Dynner delivered a presentation on this topic at the New York-based Center for Jewish History, he was astonished to see that a huge crowd had turned out for his lecture. "A tide of people waving genealogical documents of various kinds – birth records, newspaper clippings, and so on – began to make its way towards me," he writes in the preface to his book.

As he discovered, many of the attendees claimed to have a grandfather who ran a tavern back in the Old Country. He was struck by the contrast: numerous historians had declared the Polish-Jewish liquor trade dead by the mid-to-late 19th-century, yet here was a multitude of people claiming their grandparents had run taverns in eastern Europe within living memory.

This intriguing book examines the Jewish liquor trade in both urban and rural areas, shows that taverns were vital points of covert liaisons during the Polish uprisings of 1830 and 1863, and explores many other aspects of this wide-ranging but previously overlooked subject. Like the large seven-branched brass chandeliers that lit up many such premises, Yankel's Tavern serves to illuminate the world of our ancestors with a penetrating light that spills well beyond the tavern doors. ■

Helen Mirren perfectly cast as Maria Altmann

JORDAN ADLER
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

There is a compelling true story behind Woman in Gold, a new drama starring Helen Mirren and Ryan Reynolds. However, this underdog tale is only intermittently engaging and not quite as powerful as it thinks it is, despite the efforts of a good ensemble.

Mirren is always a terrific screen presence and she is perfectly cast as Maria Altmann, an aging Jewish woman hoping to reclaim several Gustav Klimt paintings that the Nazis stole from her family.

One of the artworks is a portrait of her aunt, Adele Bloch-Bauer, drenched in gold. Valued at more than $100 million, the painting is considered to be "the Mona Lisa of Austria" and hangs in the country's national gallery.

Now a native of Los Angeles, Maria wants to repossess the painting that belonged to her family, of a woman who meant so much to her. She tells young, inexperienced lawyer Randy Schoenberg (Reynolds) that she wants the artwork back for honour and justice, not money.

Soon after, the fussy old lady and her milquetoast attorney fly to Vienna to challenge the Austrian government over the painting.

Helen Mirren and Ryan Reynolds star in the drama Woman in Gold, based on an aging Jewish woman's quest to reclaim Guztav Klimt paintings stolen by the Nazis.

Inspired by the British documentary Stealing Klimt, Woman in Gold, which opens nationwide on April 3, swerves between riveting historical drama and a rather kitschy depiction of true events.

The best moments in director Simon Curtis's film are its flashback sequences, filled with an overwhelming white hue. These scenes, poignant and tense, show how Maria encountered anti-Semitism in Vienna as a young woman.

In the film's most riveting sequence, we watch Maria attempt to escape the city with her husband, even with Nazis teeming around the airport and major centres.

Canadian actor Tatiana Maslany (from Orphan Black) plays young Maria with a defiance and emotional vigour that much of the rest of the film lacks.

When Woman in Gold returns to Maria and Randy's more contemporary legal battles – not to forget the odd-couple idiosyncrasies played for light comedy – the film is not as affecting.

Maria is rather contradictory. At the film's start, she explains she would rather die than return to Austria. However, during a passionate speech given in Vienna about her family and the war, she never wilts into pained tears or anxiety.

Randy's character arc is more interesting. As Maria's case immerses him in Jewish history, he begins to get in touch with a religious heritage he hasn't thought too much about. However, a scene at a Vienna Holocaust memorial where Randy confronts this horror is rushed and thus feels emotionally cheap.

Woman in Gold comes from Alexi Kaye Campbell's first produced screenplay. Unfortunately, the story is jammed with stock characters. Daniel Brühl (from Rush) is wasted as an Austrian investigative journalist, a character that mainly exists to spout exposition. Katie Holmes is stuck in an embarrassingly tiny role as Randy's supportive, pregnant wife.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

JCC event shows that all bodies can dance

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

After a car accident in her early 20s left her disabled, Simi Linton, an American activist, author and speaker now in her 60s, came to the realization that it was not so much the wheelchair she rode that was disabling, but the environment around her.

This awareness spurred Linton's decades-long fight for greater societal inclusion of people with disabilities, be it through municipal infrastructure, better design of public and private institutions or opening up spaces within the arts, such as dance. The effort is chronicled in the 2014 documentary Invitation to Dance, which Linton co-produced with Christian Von Tippelskirch.

The film also delves into Linton's rediscovery of dance as an expression of joy and sexuality after initially assuming her disabled body didn't belong on a dance floor.

It features performance shots of an American mixed-abilities dance troupe whose members have a variety of body types, including those who use, and dance, in wheelchairs.

The film and an ensuing panel discussion were part of a March 22 event at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre (MNJCC), hosted in partnership with the Ryerson School of Disabilities Studies and Tangled Art + Disability, a non-profit dedicated to enhancing opportunities for artists with disabilities.

The event, which concluded with a mixed abilities dance party, highlighted a new MNJCC push to be more accessible and inclusive. As part of this effort, Liviya Mendelsohn was hired last September as the MNJCC's accessibility and inclusion co-ordinator.

Mendelsohn said she hoped Invitation to Dance would serve as a catalyst for viewers to talk about accessibility generally and as it pertains to the arts world.

Several years ago, Mendelsohn explained, the MNJCC began to talk more seriously about inclusion and conducted a needs assessment to see "who was in the building, who felt included, who wanted to be here but wasn't, and what barriers they faced."

After finding there were people in the community who weren't being adequately supporting, the MNJCC applied for a Trillium grant that allowed it to hire Mendelsohn and undertake further inclusivity measures.

"We're doing everything from building capacity through staff training, outreach and listening to people with disabilities and their families about what their needs are," she said.

Outreach has extended to all areas of the JCC, Mendelsohn noted, and developments have included an accessible yoga class and partnerships both current and upcoming with groups such as the Ontario Basketball Association and the Down Syndrome Association of Toronto to make sports and swimming more inclusive.

The centre also recently partnered with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Itanu Toronto inclusion initiative to run an educational workshop on inclusiveness for 40 Jewish communal leaders, including rabbis, day school teachers and laypeople.

After the film, the 60 or so attendees – many of whom used wheelchairs – listened to panelists Nicole Meehan, a dancer and a student at the Ryerson School of Disability Studies, Catherine McKinnon, co-founder and festival director of the Toronto International Deaf Film and Arts Festival and Mark Brose, a wheelchair dancer.

Courtroom scenes needed to be more engaging

Furthermore, Randy's stern boss, played by The Imitation Game's Charles Dance, is also a cliché. "Since when have we been paying you to have feelings?" he barks at Randy, after the lawyer notes his interest in spending more time with Maria's case.

To fit a complex legal case into a 109-minute film, Campbell's screenplay reduces a lot of this intriguing history into its barest, most superficial elements. The courtroom scenes, blandly shot and filled with clunky legal jargon, also need to be more engaging.

Meanwhile, the Austrian lawyers and officials are a stereotypically sneering bunch. Many of these characters are reduced to pompous caricatures that don't get much of a chance to defend their own interests in a national treasure.

The move by Austria's government to return stolen Nazi artwork to its citizens is dismissed as a PR stunt, even if its intentions were noble. As beautiful as Vienna looks in Curtis' film, one doubts the Austrian population will be too happy with how they are haughtily represented.

Woman in Gold is less two-dimensional with Maria and Randy. Despite Mirren and Reynolds' best efforts, though, Curtis' drama too often reduces a fascinating story into easily digestible plot points. It is, ultimately, a film about reclaiming an artwork that doesn't stake much of a claim on being artful or absorbing. ■

Dance is a subtle way of advocating for disability rights

The discussion, moderated by Eliza Chandler, a postdoctoral fellow at the Ryerson School of Disability Studies and artistic director at Tangled Art + Disability, looked at dance as a vehicle for disability activism, as well as representations of disabled people in places the screen and stage and government support for artists with disabilities.

"Dance is a subtle and non-aggressive way of advocating for disability rights," Meehan said.

Brose, who said he had to give up a career as a goldsmith after developing multiple sclerosis, said dancing on stage has been a wonderful way to recover his sense of self-expression.

He noted that the Ontario Arts Council recently announced that it will be offering funding options for deaf and disabled artists.

McKnnon touched on the importance of people with disabilities being better represented in the arts scene.

"We need to advocate more to be included... [For example], it's important as a deaf community to show films where people are signing."

Several audience members shared their experiences of working as freelance, disabled artists and struggling to obtain grants while on the Ontario Disability Support Program.

The event concluded with a lively, free-form dance party with DJ Layah Jane.

Though the event's content did not focus on the Jewish community, Mendelsohn said she would encourage anyone in the community who is planning or designing an event or program to "ask everyone what their needs are what you can contribute around that."

"Inclusion is a deeply Jewish value," she said.

Playwright takes latest work to infinity and beyond

AMY GRIEF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

A play about time and theoretical physics may sound daunting, but acclaimed playwright Hannah Moscovitch worked with renowned physicist Lee Smolin – along with a full creative team – to produce one.

Moscovitch's Infinity has its world premier at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre on April 1. While the play explores Smolin's theory of time, outlined in his 2013 book Time Reborn, "the play itself is sort of two stories that are intertwined," Moscovitch says. "One is the love story between Carmen (Amy Rutherford), who's a composer, and Elliot (Paul Braunstein), who is a physicist, and that's intertwined with a sexual history of a young woman named Sarah Jean (Haley McGee)."

Ross Manson, the artistic director at Toronto's Volcano Theatre, commissioned the play in 2008. "When Ross Manson originally came to me and said he wanted to write about time, I thought he was a lunatic more or less," says Moscovitch, who's originally from Ottawa.

She worked collaboratively with director Manson, choreographer Kate Alton and composer Njo Kong Kie to develop the play over the years. Smolin, billed as the consulting physicist on the project, even wrote an eight-page biography for the character of Elliot, and parts of it have been incorporated into the show.

Actors including Haley McGee joined the project in spring 2013. "So rarely do you get to live with something and have it kind of percolate for that long," she says.

Hannah Moscovitch's Infinity opened on April 1.

McGee, who's also an award-winning playwright, thinks the long process lent itself well to Infinity. "It's a play about a family, and so there is a kind of familiarity that you're able to build over two years... that is much harder to achieve in a regular three-week rehearsal period."

Infinity doesn't focus only on the nitty-gritty theoretical elements of time; it also looks at how ideologies are passed down between generations – a theme all the more relevant now that Moscovitch is starting a family.

"It's in fact a play about how large systems of thought influence who we are and shape who we are and how we think," Moscovitch says.

For her, Judaism is one such system. "I think Judaism has informed all my writing just because it's inextricable from who I am."

Her work includes 2007's East of Berlin, a play that examines the legacy of the Holocaust. Last year, Moscovitch took home the Ontario Trillium Book Award for This is War, about Canadian soldiers serving in Afghanistan. This makes her the first playwright to collect the province's top literary prize since its inception in 1987. In 2013, Nobel laureate Alice Munro was the English language winner. "Anytime when you can win an award the year after Alice Munro, you feel good," Moscovitch says.

Moscovitch's career isn't limited to playwriting – it spans a variety of media. She currently writes for CBC's original television show X Company, a World War II spy drama that premiered on Feb. 18. Her venture into television is common among playwrights.

"Television is so alluring because the best storytelling is happening on television, I think," she says. "There's very good storytelling in every medium, but TV is just so good today."

In February 2014, she made her debut in the opera world after writing the libretto for I Have No Stories To Tell You. It's an original piece, with music by Lembit Beecher, commissioned by New York City's Gotham Chamber Opera and performed at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. In theatre, she's currently working on a three-part adaption of Ann-Marie MacDonald's novel Fall on Your Knees for the Shaw Festival.

Earlier this year, her play What a Young Wife Ought to Know opened in Halifax. And, she'll likely keep making revisions on Infinity even as the play goes into previews.

"Hannah needs to watch it with an audience and see what's landing, what's working what needs to be tweaked," McGee says. "I like that. It's very exciting to be part of that process." ■

Infinity runs from April 1-May 25 at Tarragon Theatre's Extraspace, 30 Bridgman Ave., Toronto, M5R 1X3. For tickets call 416-531-1827 or visit www.tarragontheatre.com

PASSOVER FOOD

Israeli moms offer family-friendly Pesach food ideas

JENNIFER TZIVIA MACLEOD
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Around our house, it wouldn't be Pesach without prowling children calling from the fridge, "There's nothing to eat!" But here in Israel, lots of hip, healthy moms make it look easy to dole out tasty treats all seven days – and beyond, since this year, the last day falls on a Friday, giving us an "eight-day Pesach."

What's their secret? Allyson doesn't seem to think it's a big deal. "We eat basically the same foods we eat the rest of the year," she says. "Lots of meat, eggs, quinoa and veggies."

Using simple, familiar foods is a common theme. Your family's favourite quiche, made with a matzah-meal crust (or crustless), makes a great weekday lunch or dinner. Add frozen broccoli for an easy nutritional boost. Another year-round comfort food? "Shepherd's pie is a real winner," raves Kat.

Simple foods can still have great flavour. Roasting can be less work than boiling or frying, and it brings out the sweetness in everything from cauliflower and squash to red peppers and mushrooms.

For meals on the go, bring along a healthier chunky tuna salad with olive oil and chopped peppers. Spread on matzah or just eat with a spoon.

When it comes to sweet treats, chocolate isn't the only option. My secret indulgence is the tinned mandarin orange segments I loved as a child. Mix in sliced bananas and a sprinkling of coconut (and, shh, don't tell) some mini-marshmallows for instant ambrosia.

Almost every mom admitted that her family loves chicken fingers, with a variety of sweet and savoury sauces. They don't have to be deep-fried – bake them in the oven instead, along with oven-baked french fries. Slice potatoes (unpeeled, if they're organic) thick or thin, toss in olive oil, sea salt, pepper and paprika, then bake until tender inside. Swap in sweet potatoes (peeled) for an easy boost of fibre.

From the "everything-old-is-new-again" department comes home pickling, a classic way to add oomph to veggies. Try cucumbers (pickles with dill and garlic), cauliflower, carrots, peppers, green tomatoes or beets. With some advance prep, you'll have quick, healthy snacks or side dishes at any Pesach meal.

What if you're gluten-free? Ronit, an Israeli mom of three, relies heavily on "quinoa and nut-based stuff." That includes desserts, where she prefers to use healthier coconut oil. "I make coconut sugar and quinoa-based cookies as a treat." (Coconut products can be tough to find with Passover supervision, so shop early or consult a rabbi.)

Traditional comfort foods still have their place, too. As one young mom said, "I spent a whole day preparing varied dishes, and two people walked into the kitchen, one after the other, saying, 'What, there's no kugel?'"

Novelty is great, but sometimes, "same-old same-old" is exactly what hits the spot.

No-Sugar-Added Turnip And Beet Pickles

From Passover Made Easy, by Victoria Dwek and Leah Schapira (Artscroll).

Don't be scared off by the word "turnip!" Prepared at least two days ahead, these absorb some of the flavour and lots of the colour of the beet. An easy intro even if you've never pickled anything in your life. Serve on fresh green lettuce topped with carrot curls for a dramatic, colourful presentation.

- ❑ 2 large turnips, peeled and thinly sliced into half moons
- ❑ 1 beet, peeled and thinly sliced into half moons
- ❑ 8 cloves garlic
- ❑ 1 jalapeño, sliced into rings (do not remove seeds)
- ❑ 1 cup water
- ❑ 1/2 tbsp. salt
- ❑ 1 tsp. vinegar

Combine turnips, beet, garlic and jalapeño in a jar. Pour water, salt and vinegar over vegetables. Cover and shake to combine.
Note: Best if made at least two days ahead. This salad will keep in the refrigerator for 10-14 days.

Almond Crusted Chicken Tenders With Honey-Lemon Dipping Sauce

From chabad.org, recipe by Miriam Szokovski.

The author writes, "The almond meal gives it a lovely nutty flavour, and a drizzle of lemon-honey sauce really takes it up a notch. I find it easier to cut the chicken thinly when it's half-frozen."

- ❑ 1 lb. chicken breast, cut into narrow strips
- ❑ 2 eggs, lightly whisked
- ❑ juice of 3 lemons
- ❑ 2 cups ground almonds

For the sauce:

- ❑ 4 tbsp. mayonnaise
- ❑ 2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- ❑ 1 tbsp. honey

Juice the lemons, and set aside 2 tablespoons for the dipping sauce.

Marinate the chicken strips in the rest of the lemon juice for 2 hours. (They will turn whitish.)

Prepare eggs in one bowl, and ground almond in a second.

Dip chicken into egg, then into the ground almond, until fully coated.

Grease a baking tray and line with parchment paper. Line chicken pieces up (don't worry if they're touching). Drizzle generously with oil. Bake at 425 for 20-25 minutes. Serve warm, with dipping sauce on the side or drizzled on top.

For Dipping Sauce:

Mix mayonnaise with honey and lemon, gently stirring in one direction until combined. You may need to adjust the proportions, depending on which mayonnaise you use and according to your taste. Serves 4. ■

CORRECTION

In the article "Passover desserts – time to start baking" (CJN, March 26), the recipe for Pesach Chocolate Chip Cookies should have called for 1/2 cup of toasted walnuts or pecans. We apologize for the error.

Happy Passover birthday

SUE EPSTEIN
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

My father's birthday always fell on Passover and I remember some pretty awful cakes and once some pieces of matzah layered with jam and birthday candles on top.

Perhaps the reason was that my mother was a terrible cook (my father did all the cooking!) and there were no Passover bakeries near where we lived. Nevertheless, today it's possible to have beautiful, high-rising cakes on Passover – whether for a special birthday or not. Here are two cakes that will be a huge hit.

It is important that the pan for a sponge cake, and any whipped egg white cake, should be ungreased, because the cake clings to the sides as it rises, thereby allowing it to rise in spite of its weight. Some reasons a cake might be falling or failing to rise, would be overbeating the egg whites – they will fall if you beat them too long – or folding the batter in too roughly, again, causing the egg whites to lose their ability to hold the air.

Passover Birthday Cake

- ❑ 10 eggs, separated
- ❑ 2 cups granulated sugar
- ❑ 1 cup Passover cake meal
- ❑ 1 heaping cup finely ground pecans
- ❑ 1 tbsp. cinnamon
- ❑ 1/3 cup sweet red or white wine

Orange Icing:

- ❑ 3 tbsp. margarine, room temperature
- ❑ 1 1/2 cups confectioners' sugar
- ❑ 2 tbsp. fresh orange juice
- ❑ 1 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
- ❑ grated orange zest, optional
- ❑ 1-2 drops Passover yellow food colouring, optional

Preheat oven to 325. In a mixing bowl, beat yolks and sugar until they are pale yellow and fluffy. Stir in cake meal, pecans, cinnamon and wine. In a separate bowl with clean beaters, whip egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold the egg whites into the batter in thirds, each time until just incorporated. Spoon the batter into a 9- or 10-in. ungreased springform pan. Make a collar out of aluminum foil around the pan, in case the cake rises above the sides. Bake for 1 hour and 15 minutes, until a tester inserted in the middle comes out clean. Cool completely on a wire rack before removing the sides of the pan. When cool, frost the top (if desired) and sides of the cake with Orange Icing.

To make the icing: Cream together the margarine and confectioners' sugar. Stir in the orange juice and lemon juice. Add a pinch of orange zest and the food colouring, if desired. Makes 8-10 servings.

Chocolate Idiot Cake

Adapted from Ready for Dessert by David Lebovitz

This cake is extremely rich, and tastes like the most delicious, silkiest, most supremely-chocolate ganache you've ever had. It's equally good a few days after baking, and only an idiot could possibly mess it up. You don't need to use Scharffen Berger chocolate for this cake, as I do, but use a good one – you'll appreciate it when you taste your first melt-in-your-mouth bite. Make sure to wrap the pan very well in foil, perhaps several layers, to prevent any water seeping in during baking.

- ❑ 10 oz. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
- ❑ 7 oz. butter, salted or unsalted, cut into pieces
- ❑ 5 large eggs, at room temperature
- ❑ 1 cup sugar

Preheat the oven to 350.

Butter a 9-in. springform pan and dust it with cocoa powder, tapping out any excess. If you suspect your springform pan isn't 100 per cent water-tight, wrap the outside with aluminum foil, making sure it goes all the way up to the outer rim.

Melt the chocolate and butter in a double boiler (or microwave), stirring occasionally, until smooth. Remove from heat.

In a large bowl, whisk together the eggs and sugar, then whisk in the melted chocolate mixture until smooth.

Pour the batter into the prepared springform pan and cover the top of the pan snugly with a sheet of foil. Put the springform pan into a larger baking pan, such as a roasting pan, and add enough hot water to the baking pan to come about halfway up to the outside of the cake pan. Bake for 1 hour and 15 minutes.

You'll know the cake is done when it feels just set, like quivering chocolate pudding. If you gently touch the centre, your finger should come away clean.

Lift the cake pan from the water bath and remove the foil. Let cake cool completely on a cooling rack.

Serve thin wedges of this very rich cake at room temperature, with ice cream or whipped cream.

Storage: This Chocolate Idiot Cake can be wrapped and chilled in the refrigerator for 3-5 days. Makes one 9-in. cake. ■

WRY BREAD

Avoiding damnation through Passover obedience

A. David Levine

From all your friends at the Kashrut Administration of Shaarei Hessed (KASH), we wish you and your family a happy Passover!

Celebrating Passover involves abstaining from bread and other leavened products (on pain of divine retribution). But that's just the beginning of the holiday – from kitchen koshering to quinoa quontroversy, we hear questions from concerned and confused community members. This year, we've put together a little guide to help you observe the holiday in a fun and relaxed way that carries no negative eternal consequences. We're proud to present Diet or Karet: Avoiding Damnation Through Passover Obedience.

Chametz: When Passover rolls around, chametz is the enemy – wheat, barley, spelt, oats and rye are politely discouraged(on pain of divine retribution). But don't just stop eating them – avoid having any traces of chametz on your property over the eight-day holiday (on pain of divine retribution). This extends to your homes, offices, cars, school lockers, storage units or anything you may have forgotten.

Other grains: Though corn and rice aren't chametz in the strict, literal, intended, or actual senses of the word, Ashkenazi Jews are still prohibited from eating or owning them on the holiday, possibly due to their past/possible confusion with wheat. This means that all beans can potentially be ground into confusing, chametz-resembling flour. So if your ancestors were driven out of eastern Europe, avoid these legumes like the plague (which probably wouldn't be your punishment if you ate them). Ashkenazi Jews can also look forward to cleansing themselves of peas, peanuts, sprouts and lentils.

But the fun doesn't stop there! For 2015, the name of the game for Passover is selection – KASH is delighted to certify a wide assortment of kosher for Passover goods and treats for you and your family.

Because of the heightened standards (and penalties) of the holiday, regular kosher items are not necessarily kosher for Passover – so say goodbye to name brands, and say hello to a range of new KASH-certified kosher for Passover offerings: Raffles Potato-based Chip-Style Food Flakes ($11.99), Ori O's Sandwich Cookies ($23.50), Uncle Binyamin's Matza Knots ($17 per tub), Crazy Yitzy's Clumps O' Sugar ($16 per sack), Rabbi Chellmann's Emulsified Oil & Egg Condiment Paste ($46.97 with coupon) and more!

In November 2014, a northbound truck loaded with seedless green grapes collided with an eastbound semi containing 3,000 loaves of Dempster's whole wheat bread just outside Erie, Pa. According to officers on the scene, some of the undamaged fruit – fruit that had collided with bread – was loaded onto a new truck, which then continued toward its original distribution venue. As we have been unable to track down the final location of this tainted shipment, until further notice from KASH, seedless and seeded green and red grapes are prohibited for Passover – along with raisins, cranberry-raisins, cranberries, all other berries, wine, grape juice, sunscreen and insulin (on pain of divine retribution).

And finally, we're dismayed to tell you that KASH has uncovered a quiet conspiracy that directly affects your soul's eternal fate. According to government sources, antibiotic cocktails introduced to Canadian dairy cows in 2014 may have contained andextrocarbopolysucrenate, a standard neurotoxin, but also a wheat derivative. As a result, KASH has been forced to declare all dairy products made in Canada strictly prohibited for consumption on Passover, including milk, cream, eggs, cheeses, yogurts, etc. In unrelated news, KASH is pleased to present Melk, a brand new line of kosher for Passover dairy substitutes newly certified for 2015!

From all of us at KASH, we wish you and yours the happiest of holidays, and we remind you that the prohibition against eating bread extends to all associated activities: attending sporting events, engaging in exercise, using the bathroom, sitting at tables, standing at counters, watching television, surfing the Internet, and dental care.

Chag Kasher v'Samayach! ■

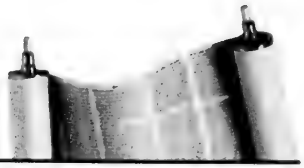
Pesach | Exodus 12:21 - 51



Rabbi Aaron Katchen says the seder helps us understand that freedom is always fragile
Rabbi Michal Shekel explains why the 10th plague is different from all the others
Rabbi Howard Morrison finds in the Haggadah a challenge for every generation

Aaron Katchen

"And you shall tell your child on that day, saying, 'Because of this, the Lord did [this] for me when I went out of Egypt' " (Exodus 13:8).

Pesach becomes a time of high anxiety, with the preparation of the house, the food, the shopping, and again, the food. What often gets left behind in the wake of preparing for Pesach is the preparation for the most important part of the holiday, the seder.

I don't mean the food, but the content.

For too long, our community has suffered under seders where either the Haggadah is recited word-for word, with little room for conversation and interpretation, or simply, "They tried to kill us. God saved us. Let's eat!" This is a shame. The seder is meant to be a family affair where we can tell our stories – both local and national. The centrepiece of this experience comes with Maggid.

Maggid is intended to help us appreciate that we will never understand what it means to be a Jew unless we internalize, annually, what it meant to be a slave and what it means to be free. Our freedom is by the will of God alone, and not because we led a slave rebellion. Freedom is always fragile.

We can improve our seders. Some people can do it through the set text of the Haggadah. Others might move off the page, with dramatic presentations. For some, through deep conversation around "When are you free/when are you a slave?" This takes work and preparation before the seder begins, but in the end, the payoff is worth it. The family is more connected to their story, the children will be more engaged and the adults will be reminded why so much effort goes into setting the stage.

Wishing each of us a better seder and a Chag Kasher v'Samayach. ■

Michal Shekel

Why is the 10th plague different from all other plagues? One of the reasons is because of the preparation undertaken by the Children of Israel. It begins with choosing and slaughtering the Pesach offering. This is followed by a ritual: "Take a bunch of hyssop, dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and apply some of the blood that is in the basin to the lintel and to the two doorposts. None of you shall go outside the door of his house until morning" (Exodus 12:22).

Similar ritualistic elements appear in the book of Leviticus (Chapter 8). When the kohanim are ordained, a ram is slaughtered as an ordination offering, and the sacrificial blood is placed on the priests, their vestments and the altar. The kohanim confine themselves to the Tent of Meeting for seven days.

The shared elements for priestly ordination and the preparation for the 10th plague consist of slaughtering an animal, the ritual use of sacrificial blood, and staying indoors. In both cases, part of the offering was consumed with unleavened bread and the sacrificial meal could not be left until morning. It had to be burned. In addition, there is a dress code for each meal. For our ancestors in Egypt proper attire meant "your loins girded, your sandals on your feet, and your staff in your hand" (Exodus 12:11). For the kohanim, it meant dressing in their priestly vestments, followed by anointing.

The ordination ritual signified a change in status for Aaron and his sons. Is it also possible to view the actions before the final plague in a similar fashion? That final night in Egypt, our ancestors entered their dwellings as slaves. The next morning they emerged not only a free people, but a nation of priests. ■

Rabbi Michal Shekel is executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis.

Howard Morrison

At the Pesach seder, we relive memories of our past. I fondly remember being one of four children and somehow always being identified as the Rasha, the wicked or rebellious son, in a joking manner. I remember the same relatives always attending our family seder, which was always held at my childhood home. I remember always wanting to recite every word of the Haggadah and discuss their contemporary relevance. (Some of the guests at the table would have preferred less discussion.)

Now in my mid-50s, with two grown children of my own, I try to infuse my childhood memories with new meaning and relevance. We use a traditional text with lots of ideas, interpretations, and insights so that everyone around the table can find meaning. We do not merely daven the text or take turns reading. Rather, we try to discuss as much as we can. For example: what are the four most meaningful questions for Jewish life in our time? How would we categorize the four types of children today? What are we trying to do to reach out to the fifth child, the one who no longer attends? Who are the modern-day Pharaohs? What are we doing to overcome their threats? How can we discuss assimilation with those around the table in a way that draws our fellow Jews nearer to their heritage and without disenfranchising them?

As we prepare for the seder, I encourage all of us to share the wonderful memories of the past, and to plant new memories for the future. The seder is one of the greatest opportunities we have to reflect, reminisce, share, and grow in a way that connects the generations. The name Haggadah stems from the two biblical words, v'higadta l'vincha – you shall tell your child. As one generation of parents taught its children; a generation later, those children own the obligation, privilege, and challenge of teaching a new generation. ■

Eclectic lineup in store at Segal next season

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

The Segal Centre for Performing Arts in Montreal has again chosen a big, splashy musical to open its main-stage theatre season.

An all-new production of Funny Girl, with Gabi Epstein of Toronto in the role of the sassy Fanny Brice, debuts Oct. 11-Nov. 1 under the direction of Shaw Festival veteran Peter Hinton.

Heading the cast of 18 in this revival and playing at the Segal for the first time is a thrill, Epstein said in a videotaped message from Toronto where she is performing in the musical Once at the Ed Mirvish Theatre.

All seven of the plays in 2015-2016 are Montreal premieres, Segal executive and artistic director Lisa Rubin announced at the season's unveiling.

The witty Tribes (Nov. 29-Dec. 20) by the British Nina Raine, described by Rubin as "one of the most talked about new plays in North America" is about a young man who is the only deaf member of his intellectual family. Montreal actor Jack Volpe, who has been hearing impaired since birth, will make his professional stage debut as the lead character, who learns how to find his own way in the world.

The press conference for the season launch was signed throughout, and during the play's run, related activities like the Sunday-@-the-Segal talk will be interpreted in American Sign Language and Langue des signes québécoises.

To begin 2016 is The Secret Annex (Jan. 31-Feb. 21) by Winnipeger Alix Sobler, which imagines an Anne Frank who survived the Holocaust and is now 25 and living in New York. Still idealistic, she is trying to get her diary published and also dealing with family and romantic entanglements. It's presented in partnership with the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Another young Canadian actress, Sara Farb, plays the lead role. Farb is now rehearsing the role of the traditional Anne Frank in the Stratford Festival's The Diary of Anne Frank. The next two mainstage plays are produced with Copa de Oro Productions, with whom the Segal has collaborated successfully in such musicals as Belles Soeurs and Forever Plaid.

The solo Boom: The Music, Culture and Events that Shaped a Generation, written, directed and performed by Gemini-and Dora awards-winner Rick Miller is a paean to the music of the baby boomers (March 20-April 10, 2016), while the off-Broadway I Love You, You're Perfect, Now Change is a musical comedy, a Tony Award winner for Joe DiPietro about the ups and downs of romantic relationships at any age (May 8-29, 2016). It will be directed by Wade Lynch, who is directing Anne of Green Gables at the Charlottetown Festival this summer. He recently moved to Montreal.

In between, on the Segal second stage, the Studio, is Joshua Harmon's Bad Jews (May 1-22, 2016) which will see Lisa Rubin make her directorial debut.

"This is about family, faith and legacy; it's thought-provoking, poignant and funny," she said, "and raises questions I have asked myself many times."

Three cousins gather to mourn the death of their beloved grandfather, and then fight over a precious family heirloom, revealing cracks in their family ties.

The Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre (DWYT) play (June 19-July 10, 2016) is a world premiere, based on another classic, an adaptation of the Mel Brooks musical The Producers.

For the first time, the DWYT is working in association with the talented amateur Côte St. Luc Dramatic Society and the show will be directed by its founding artistic director Anisa Cameron, who also heads Bialik High School's theatre program.

Former DWYT director Bryna Wasserman, now executive director of New York's Folksbiene Yiddish theatre, is artistic consultant.

Rubin said the Segal is trying to get Brooks to attend this production rendered in the language in which he grew up.

The Segal also views as an important part of its mission the nurturing of local small theatrical companies. Through 2015-2016, its Studio will be the scene of productions by Teesri Duniya, Tableau d'Hôte Theatre, Youtheatre, and the French-language Les Productions Pas de Panique.

The Segal also unveiled a six-concert jazz series opening in October with the six-time Grammy-nominated singer Tierney Sutton. This will be the eighth season of jazz at the centre. ■

Noam Zion: the Haggadah is not the libretto of the seder, it's a leader's guide

LILA SARICK
STAFF REPORTER

Noam Zion is a senior research fellow at the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem and the author of A Different Night The Family Participation Haggadah and A Night to Remember, which he wrote with his son, Mishael Zion. He was at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation March 26 to 28, speaking about Passover.

How has the seder changed over the years?

There have been three great generations of the model of the seder, and I'm hoping that my Haggadah promotes a fourth model.'

These three models I call them the zaide seder, the Maxwell House Haggadah seder and the Jewish Catalogue and its influence on the seder. And what I call my Haggadah is the Starbucks Haggadah.

The basic patterns of the zaides who came over is they knew Hebrew and they read it aloud very fast with a heavy accent. There was no attempt to have an intellectual discussion or to dramatize it or to talk about contemporary issues. The children had their standard role, which was Ma Nishtana and the afikoman, and women had no roles to play in the official part of the seder at all.

The next generation looked back at the seder as what they thought was authentic, but they wanted something in English.

So beginning in 1934, Maxwell House began producing the Haggadot translated into English but translated into English that was an imitation of the King James Bible. So it was not an English translation that made the text more accessible. It was an English translation that made the text sound sacred.

The notion of participation began, but participation only meant that everyone had a turn reading, so the women finally had a role.

What happened, of course, was the seder became much longer. But people didn't want their seders to be longer, so you began with every family finding its own solution, often during the evening itself, a battle between traditionalists and non-traditionalists as to what they were going to skip and how they were going to make it faster.

Or, the way I put it, it's the public recitation of a sacred text for as long as you can until hunger overtakes you.

The next stage was the Jewish Catalogue. It added something special, it was a "do it yourself" kind of thing. So people would add games and activities and drama, which were lovely for making it more fun and more participatory and, at the same time, because this was the '60s and '70s, you have the production of partisan Haggadot. There's the Liberated Lamb for vegetarians. There's the Freedom Seder for new, left Jews, there's the women's Haggadot. And in the 1970s and'80s, the Conservative and Reform movements rewrote their Haggadot. They were very Zionist, very Jewish People oriented.

However, with all the changes, the attitude toward the text stayed the same in the sense that people were still going around and reading something.

In all these cases, the Haggadah was the libretto of the seder. What my son and I tried to do is to give a different conception to the function of the Haggadah at the seder.

Until the end of the 19th century, people didn't have multiple Haggadot in their houses. So, the rabbis' notion of the seder was not the reading of a book. What I came to understand is the Haggadah is a leader's guide. It's supposed to help the leader do a series of oral activities, not reading out loud activities. And those oral activities are asking questions, not the Four Questions, but asking your own questions, telling the story… and they meant for people to have a rabbinic-style symposium taking the section, "My father was a wandering Aramean," and beginning to expound on it. And part of the oral activity was eating those symbols, explaining those edible symbols, not reading the explanation.

The new conception of the Haggadah that I have done is, when you buy a Haggadah, you have not bought a libretto that you're supposed to follow. You have taken up a menu where you have to pick and choose from the various categories in the menu.

Which is why we created for each Haggadah the seder planner that lists the elements in the seder and encourages you to pick and choose which ones you want to do according to your family, it doesn't matter whether you're Orthodox or not Orthodox, and then it has suggestions depending on the age group you're most interested in.

When you ask for a Maxwell House coffee, there are very few choices involved, but when you ask for Starbucks, there are multiple choices and you're not always going to order the same kind.

My notion is these books serve the function of home-made Judaism, helping people to make their own Judaism, and when you make your own, then you're making it meaningful for yourself.

It's been noted that Jews are more likely to attend a seder than do any other Jewish ritual. What is the attraction of the seder?

[First of all] it's a family covenant renewal ceremony. It's like how you re-up your membership in the family.

The second thing is the way the Haggadah has been interpreted in the modern world is to identify it with values that are not problematic in the modern world, like freedom or sensitivity to poverty or hope for a better world. You might have an objection to Yom Kippur if you don't believe in God and you think sin is overrated. And further, Pesach doesn't require a synagogue.

As Jews have higher levels of intermarriage, very often the intermarried person, whether they convert to Judaism or they continue to be loyal to Christianity, they tend to have a positive attitude toward religiosity, and they're interested in the seder.

Ehud Barak: Israel and the IDF are strong and the outlines of peace are clear

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Former Israeli prime minister speaks in Toronto earlier this month. GEORGE PIMENTEL PHOTO

Ehud Barak has served the State of Israel in numerous capacities. The most highly decorated soldier in the country's history, he was Israel's prime minister from 1999 to 2001. More recently he held the posts of minister of defence and deputy prime minister in the government of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. He was in Toronto recently as the keynote speaker in a fundraiser for Ezer Mizion, an Israeli charity that has compiled a bone marrow donor registry.

You're in Toronto to support a charity whose focus is on bone marrow registry. I understand that the Israel Defence Forces is involved in a bone marrow registry. Can you tell us about that?

It's more than 10 years now there is an organized effort initiated by Ezer Mizion but backed by our Ministry of Defence, including the time I was minister of defence, that every young soldier on the first day of his coming to his induction bases is allowed voluntarily to join in the bone marrow bank, or registry. And there are many of them ready to do it. Nowadays the technology is very simple. It's a very easy procedure. They give a small sample of their blood, and that's it.

Until now there are probably 325,000 soldiers already registered. Israel is like a mosaic of multiplicities and backgrounds. It is an extremely rich contribution to the bone marrow bank. They are all young people, which is better from the medical point of view. There are already several hundreds of life-saving cases where not just a match was found, but an actual bone marrow transplant took place.

In many cases it's irreplaceable, because some people can't find a match in their families. That leads people to die or to get the bone marrow transplant from the bank. It happens that soldiers are now 40 per cent of the bank.

In the recent Israeli election, you endorsed Isaac Herzog of the Zionist Union. Polls showed he was ahead of Netanyahu, but in the end, Netanyahu won. Why do you think Mr. Herzog lost?

I'm not going to analyze the election. It's a decision of the people. You count the vote and then you know who was less successful this time. We have to respect the verdict of the voters. We are a democracy. You might like more or less this or that candidate. In Israel there is no shortage of candidates. It was Churchill, I believe, who said democracy is the worst governing system he can think of, except all the other known ones.

In terms of the peace negotiations with the Palestinians, what difference do you think a Herzog-led government would have made versus a Netanyahu-led government?

I will not get into speculation. We all respect the verdict of the voter. We expect the government to realize that it serves the people of Israel, not this or that party, and I think until now that was the record, difference in policies and beliefs and worldview, but that is the way democracy operates. Now we can wish and expect that the government will now do all whatever it takes first of all to ensure the security of the State of Israel, to improve its relationships with other nations and to take care of the opportunities for peace.

How much more can Israel offer the Palestinians beyond what you offered and what former prime minister Ehud Olmert offered? Is there much more room to manoeuvre?

No, there is not a lot. I've said more than once that whether it takes five, 15 or 50 years, when a peace agreement will be achieved, you will need a magnifying glass to see the differences between what was on the table in 1999, when I was prime minister, and what has been finally achieved. It will look basically the same. We all know the area, we know the issues and we should hope for a moment of grace where this could be done without risking the security of Israel. Even if it can't be done, I think we should consider unilateral steps to make sure we can get these security settlement blocs, which are needed for security, the presence over the Jordan River and so on.

> I believe we can act out of self-confidence, from a position of strength, trying to shape our future in order to reduce friction and reduce friction of major clashes. So I'm not afraid of anything around us

Basically, it takes two to tango. You cannot do it alone, and we need to wait until the Arab leaders on one hand, especially the Palestinians but the rest of the Arab moderate leaders, together with the world community, step forward with readiness to negotiate an acceptable agreement. My strong belief is that when this happens, you will find also readiness on the Israeli side.

There are some analysts who ask how can Israel make peace with the Palestinian Authority when the day after tomorrow Hamas could take over the government. You've made an agreement and now missiles are raining down on your heads?

We are not dismantling the IDF. Israel is the strongest country for 1,000 miles around Jerusalem and will remain the strongest country all over the region for the foreseeable future.

I believe we can act out of self-confidence, from a position of strength, trying to shape our future in order to reduce friction and reduce friction of major clashes. So I'm not afraid of anything around us. You do not control everything what happens around you. But we shouldn't be frightened. We're strong. The IDF remains, the secret service, Shabak, remains. We are not supposed to give up our security demands. No one should expect it from us. We will never do it even if someone will try to convince us.

Having said this, with all respect to the changes in the Middle East in recent years, where the Arab spring turned into the Islamic winter, Israel remains the strongest country, and I don't think the future of reconciliation is incompatible with the security of Israel. The opposite is true. If we succeed in bringing reconciliation, it will strengthen even more the security of Israel.

How would you characterize the relationship between Israel and the United States now?

At the popular level, it's great. I don't think, except for Canada, we have a place on earth where we enjoy such popular support. Not everyone in the country, but a solid majority all over this huge continent.

On the political side, I think we enjoy a lot of support on both sides of the political aisle. Of course there are differences. Some people criticize us. It is natural among friends. It sometimes happens. I don't expect all Americans or legislators to always agree with everything any Israeli government says. I think with the present government of Israel, it is quite clear there is slightly more support on the Republican side among legislators than the Democratic side. I don't think it's extremely significant.

Ehud Barak: relations with the U.S. are strong

The relationship with the Pentagon and the American intelligence community and the overall relationship with regard to the security of Israel is great – in a certain sense, deeper than ever. And I cannot deny that there is a commander-in-chief sitting in the White House, and he's part of it. It won't happen if he would not back it, support it and encourage it.

I was defence minister until about two years ago, and I remember under [U.S. President Barack] Obama several cases that he intervened personally to make sure Israel gets the support it needs for its missile defence system, like Iron Dome, or Arrow or David's Sling, and he backed an extremely unprecedented and deep co-operation between our intelligence communities.

That doesn't mean we don't have disputes with the American administration. We had them in the past, and we probably will in the future. I think that the less disputes we have, it's better for Israel and probably for America, too.

Do you expect the United States and the western powers to sign a nuclear deal with Iran that is dangerous for Israel?

We don't know yet whether there will be or there won't be an agreement. I'm not sure. If there is an agreement, according to the contours that are discussed right now, it might be far from being a good one.

There are many weaknesses, but I don't know what will be agreed. You have to read it once it's agreed.

It's not just about Israel. It's about the security of the world, because a military nuclear Iran is a major risk for the whole world. It means the end of any conceivable non-proliferation regime, because Saudi Arabia will turn very shortly afterward into a nuclear power. Turkey will immediately start to turn nuclear. And even Egypt.

It will open the door for a nightmarish kind of vision described years ago by Prof. Graham Ellison of Harvard, who said that once it's broken, it's only a matter of time, 10 or 15 years, until certain crude nuclear devices will find themselves in the hands of terrorist groups. So it's a real risk for the world. We see it from a closer distance, so we are warning the world not to reach there and we still believe that all options should remain on the table and sanctions should be held until it becomes clear what direction the whole thing is taking.

There's a lot of instability in the region all around Israel. How prepared is the IDF to deal with all these challenges?

The IDF is very strong. It depends how far you look. Israel is far from being in the situation of 1938 in Europe or 1947 in Palestine, just before the emergence of Israel. We're much stronger physically. Part of it is the result of American support, of some $3 billion per year, and weapons and platforms.

We are much stronger than we have ever been. But the reality is that the neighbours are also stronger. They accumulate a lot of weapons and machines that can create a lot of damage.

The nature of warfare is changing, dramatically. I don't think that a major kind of attack by a neighbouring air force or heavy armoured division is extremely relevant these days, but there are other threats, like missiles, rockets and terror.

And we have to adapt and we are doing it quite well. I'm comfortable with the position of the IDF. ■

Noam Zion: fun should be integral to the seder

And of course, if there are children, and it's so child-friendly as a holiday the way we've restructured it, it's very important for the kids to have that experience. At the very least, you'll have parents who are doing it for the children.

Have we made seders too much fun?

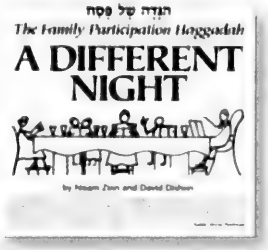
I think the rabbis clearly were interested in making it fun. You're supposed to play the game with the afikoman, which goes back to the Talmud. The songs… Chad Gadya and Echad mi Yodea, all of those are about fun, which serves a purpose.

The seder is extremely difficult to orchestrate precisely because it should be a three-ring circus. The three rings, however, are the rings of making it fun and using edible symbols, but from that fun, going back to what the things stand for, what their symbolic meanings are. Part of the ring is that you want to appeal to adults and older children having an intellectual discussion about freedom and slavery and part of it is you want to have a ritual order.

Doesn't the leader need a lot of Jewish education to lead a symposium?

The rabbis put very, very high expectations on the regular Jew. That's why I understand people retreating to the reading of the book, so at least they get it right, or they think it's right.

I don't think you need so much knowledge. You need a paradigm shift. You need somebody to say there's a do it yourself part of the seder where you're going to have to pick and choose what's most important. You need to delegate responsibility, not just who's going to read, but delegating three or four people who will prepare in advance and bring something to the seder, whether it's personal or it's traditional.



The larger purpose of the Haggadah is intergeneration storytelling.

You don't need lots of Jewish knowledge, because you're not giving a lecture and because the book is there. Delegate responsibilities not to the most knowledgeable person coming to the seder but to the most extroverted person going to the seder, the people who like to be showpeople.

You are giving a lecture on 101 ideas for a more participatory seder. Can you leave us with one?

The larger purpose of the Haggadah is intergenerational storytelling – the story of going out of Egypt – and telling it to our children. But it's also the principle of other forms of intergenerational storytelling, from what my grandfather and my grandmother did down to the grandchildren.

[One way] to achieve that personal storytelling between generations is to invite people to have a second seder plate made up of souvenirs from the people who are coming. It can be a passport, it can be a ladle from the chicken soup. Each souvenir represents an important stage in their Jewish journey.

Getting people to tell those personal stories is one way you get people to use the Haggadah as a springboard to go beyond the book into the conversation, the oral activities. ■

The last supper

Backstory

EROL ARAF
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

Deeply concerned about the fate of foreign Jews in detention camps in Turkey during World War II, the leaders of the Jewish community of Istanbul approached the governor of the city, Lutfi Kirdar, and sought his help in alleviating the difficult conditions of their co-religionists.

Kirdar explained that his hands were tied with those already in detention – the pressure and threats from Berlin were "relentless" according the governor. Nevertheless, he acceded to the request to grant Jewish refuges weekend passes on the community's cognizance. At the very least, these souls would celebrate Sabbath in Jewish households before facing a future fraught with uncertainties.

My polyglot maternal grandparents, Samuel and Lotte Gabay, who lived in Chaldean (Kadikoy) on a street called Uzun Hafiz were among the first to receive these refugees. They came from all over Europe and from all walks of life. They were destitute, broken and frightened: a violinist named Monsieur Marius from Hungary; Juran and Livrescu, brothers from Romania; the Starssbergs from Belgium; and an Italian chef who owned a restaurant in the Jewish Quarter of Rome.

The first order of the day would be burning their lice-infested clothing, followed by a visit to the Turkish bath located in the cellar of the large house. Next was a "fashion show" which generated a great deal of mirth as the visitors tried on brand new clothing donated by local manufacturers. Greek seamstress girls while adjusting sleeves and hems would sew into the clothing secret mini-pockets to conceal gold coins and scarce currencies.

Then it was time to welcome the Sabbath. A festive meal was followed by everyone congregating around the radio for the latest news. Later on, some would play chess and poker. Others would read in the library, or write letters. Many would talk till the early hours on the morning, baring their souls and sharing their grief over lives stolen and destroyed.

It would be more of the same on Saturday, culminating in the recitation of Havdalah at the synagogue of Hemdat Israel.

The next day, a leisurely walk by the sea to the port – vaporettos crisscrossing the Sea of Marmara between Asia and Europe – against the backdrop of a thousand minarets, would be the prelude to the main event of the day: the Sunday luncheon. The meal would be served, weather permitting, under the gigantic hazelnut tree in Lotte's enchanting floral garden. The last supper would be a mainly vegetarian Sephardi feast (meat and poultry were scarce). Eggplant au gratin (almodrote); fish in plum sauce; assorted vegetables cooked in olive oil and – for the finale – a rainbow compote. As ersatz Turkish coffee was served, Samuel would introduce his guests to the pleasures of the hookah. The cook Maneka would be invited to foretell the future by reading hidden omens in coffee cups always speaking words of joy and comfort. They would then gather in the library for a piano recital given by my aunt Sonia.

During the concert, the Kurdish girls who helped Lotte in household chores would prepare parcels of food containing dried fruits, Turkish delights and assorted pastries called borecas. Packs of cylindrical black cigarettes would be squeezed next to sardine cans for the long journey ahead.

The peaceful interlude in the midst of the incandescence of war would come to an end in the late afternoon on Sundays as the brass clock, mounted on the shoulders of a bronze Atlas, would strike the hour of return. Hugs, tears, prayers, blessings and promises to meet again after the war would mingle in an unforgettable tableau of valediction in the front yard of the house.

Muslim neighbours too would come out to say goodbye to complete strangers. Some would give them miniature Qur'ans, others would attach blue stones with safety pins, for good luck, on the reverse side of the lapels of the departing guest. As the horse-drawn phaeton would move on the cobblestones of Uzun Hafiz street, a friend would throw a bowl of water after the carriage: a Turkish custom for wishing voyagers Godspeed.

No one who passed through the house of Lotte and Samuel Gabay during the war returned or called afterwards. ■

RACHEL SHTIBEL

I was born in 1935 in Poland and lived in the village of Turka near the city Kolomyja. I lived with my parents, Sara Malka and Israel Dov Milbauer, my paternal grandparents, Frida and Eliyahu Milbauer, and my two uncles, Uncle Velvel and Uncle Yehoshua who were the younger brothers of my father. My Zaidie Eliyahu was a kohen and so were his three sons. My family was Orthodox and observed all the religious customs. It was a happy and loving home.

My heart is vividly engraved with wonderful Passover memories. My family prepared for the holiday by painting the house white, everything was cleaned, dishes were changed and the aroma of cooking and baking was pleasantly overwhelming.

I see in front of my eyes a beautiful table set with a white tablecloth, candles in the silver candelabra, the matzah covered with an embroidered special white cloth, all the beautiful dishes and silver cutlery. We prepared ourselves for the holiday by bathing and dressing in beautiful and new holiday clothes. I myself wore a white embroidered blouse with a navy blue pleated little skirt. My Zaidie Eliyahu, who led the seder, prepared and set aside the afikoman. I, being the youngest at the table, and the only child present, proudly asked the four questions, with help from my father and uncles.

My mind was only on the afikoman and I wanted to be the one to find it and hide it from everyone. I left the seder table and took the afikoman from its hiding place where my Zaidie Eliyahu hid it and placed it under the pillow in my own bed.

Little did I know that my Uncle Velvel had his eye on me and without my knowing took the afikoman from my bed and hid it in the third spot for that night. My Uncle Velvel was unaware that his own younger brother Yehoshua was following this afikoman and hid it for the last time from all of us. When the time came in the seder to reclaim the afikoman, I came up empty, Uncle Velvel came up empty, and Zaidie Eliyahu could not find it either. Finally Uncle Yehoshua produced the missing afikoman. What fun and excitement we all had that Passover seder.

May I say that the lost afikoman was given to me to claim. How excited I was to hear from my Zaidie that for the next eight days of Passover he would crack open the walnuts that were grown on our property, and I would help by scooping out the nuts with my little fingers, and putting them all in a silver bowl given to me by my Bubbie Frida. These walnuts were shared and enjoyed by my family after dinner. Uncle Velvel would play his violin and we would all sing Yiddish songs and songs from the Haggadah.

This was my happiest and most memorable Passover. I was four years old, the year was 1939, and none of us knew that it would be the last time that our whole family would be together to celebrate Passover. ■

The Memory of Smell

RITA WILDER CRAIG

My mother couldn't stand it said she didn't know how they could live there but I loved that smell and would wait for it to waft across to my aunt and uncle's flat a pleasure second only to Perchik's where you could scoop the real thing from a barrel in the street

The attraction wasn't just the smell – there were my two older cousins Celia and Stella – women really to my child – shy girls living seemingly uneventful lives until suddenly they left for Israel never to be seen again at least by me

And who could blame them you can't live all your life across from a pickle factory

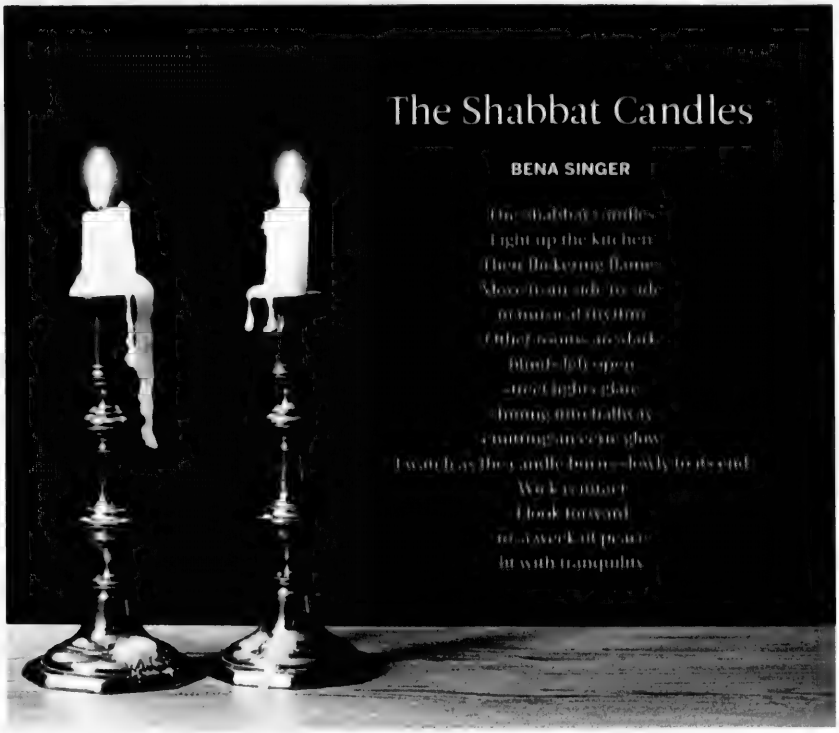
I suppose



The Shabbat Candles

BENA SINGER

The Shabbat candles
Light up the kitchen
Their flickering flames
Move from side to side
In musical rhythm
Other rooms are dark
Blind-like eyes
Sweet light's glare
Burning into hallways
Counting invisible ghosts
I watch as they candle burn—lovely to see and Work is minor
I look forward
To a sweet prayer
Filled with tranquility

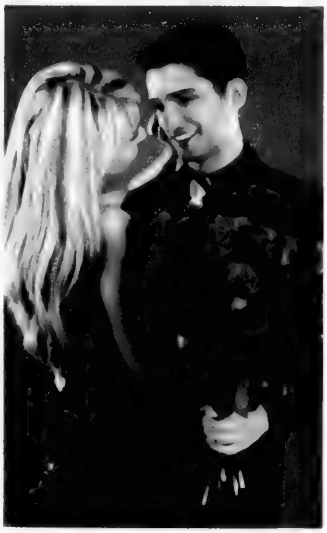
First Date Prep: Not Too Jewish



JULIE SCHWARTZ

It is 1970. I am 19 years old, and my mother and father are worried that I am spending time with the wrong people – long-haired, aimless hippie types, dedicated to turning on, tuning out and protesting everything. Boys, my father says, will be lucky to get jobs painting the yellow lines on highways. Boys, my mother says, are only interested in one thing.

"Norman, can't you arrange for one of your medical students to take her out for dinner?" my mother petitions.

My father eventually responds with a promising med student in the third year class he teaches. The victim's name is Toby Mandelman: a "wonderful Penn graduate" who grew up on Philadelphia's Main Line in a well-respected family of lawyers. Toby is Jewish, but not too Jewish. According to my mother's standards, this means that nothing about him suggests Judaism other than his last name. "He loves music, offers up my father – classical music.

"He has tickets to the Philadelphia Orchestra's all Chopin program, and wants to take you to dinner at Le Bec Fin."

Le Bec Fin is Philadelphia's finest French restaurant. I live for rock music and would prefer tickets to see the Doors at the Electric Factory, and then feed the munchies with piles of fries along with friends at South Street's Blue Dog Café.

I announce that I will only co-operate if I can wear jeans to the orchestra.

"We will get you something more appropriate," my mother insists.

"No way I wear a dress," I insist back.

A nice blouse and decent pants (defined as all one colour, worn at the waist and hemmed and unfrayed at the bottoms) evolve as the default outfit and the shopping safari for my date clothing is on. My mother drives us to Loehmann's, New York's mecca of low-priced high fashion that has finally opened in Philadelphia.

"Last Wednesday, I saw Rhoda Himowitz here with Becky and they found a stunning Cacheral skirt and an Oscar de la Renta blouse."

"Becky is a goody goody suck in Girls Service League. She has millions of skirt and sweater sets that she looks fat in, and who cares what she wears anyway?"

In the store with me in tow, my mother bypasses the main section and beelines for the Back Room – Loehmann's inner sanctum of designer duds reserved for the couture cognoscenti.

She scans the racks with a practiced eye, and in under five minutes, recruits three pairs of "exquisite pants and perfect blouses" that I am to try on.

This involves jostling our way into the communal dressing room where any notions of privacy are dashed in the light of the twinkling chandelier that illuminates excess pounds of flesh spilling out over bra cups and too-tight pantyhose waists.

Luckily, the third pair of pants I try on is the charm. Several flesh-spillers agree with my mother that these pants are truly stunning, and "will take me anywhere." As long as they take me out of Loehmann's, I will be happy. They do, along with a robin's egg blue Candice Bergen tailored button-down blouse.

When Toby came to pick me up for our date, he turned out to be smart, pleasant and clean-cut. He was polite and actually took me seriously. As the proverbial parental dream date he was, by definition, nowhere near right for 19-year-old, Jim Morrison-crazed me.

The Chopin concert was actually bearable, but dinner was way too fancy. The pommes frites were up to the standards of my impeccable outfit, but nowhere near as satisfying as Blue Dog fries with stoned friends.

Toby actually followed my father's footsteps into internal medicine at Temple University Hospital. Thankfully, I eventually met Larry Schwartz and followed him to Canada in 1977. ■

The Village and the Maggid

BARRY ROSEN

Long ago, in another land, there was a Jewish village where hard times had found a good home. It became the type of place where, if they manufactured umbrellas it would never rain, and if they made coffins then nobody would ever die. In addition to their economic problems, the people in the village were very negative. If the sun shone, they would say "sure it may be sunny now but soon everything will dry up and we'll die of thirst!" If there was a gentle rain, they would say, "this will only get worse and we will all drown in a flood!" The few visitors that came to the village found their luck changed – from good to bad. Things became so miserable that the place became known as the Village of Sorrow. Needless to say, this name did not do anything to improve their situation.

In a distant village, there lived a maggid – a travelling Jewish storyteller. The maggid was known by a single name, Chazanov. Most people were surprised when they discovered that Chazanov was a woman named Chana. A female maggid was unheard of since the popular belief at the time was that a maggid could only be a man. But when Chana Chazanov began to speak, there was virtual silence – the adults would stop talking, the children would stop playing, the crows would stop crowing and the cows would stop mooing. Chana was known not only for her amazing storytelling skills, but also for her chicken soup, which was exquisitely delicious.

Chana's husband Nachum was her manager. He helped her make the arrangements for her various storytelling concerts throughout the land and he drove their wagon. They were a team, but in truth Chana did most of the work. She knew this, but she didn't mind as her love for Nachum was as deep as the ocean.

Since they were getting on in years, Chana and Nachum had become tired of travelling. They were on their way to do a final storytelling concert, travelling in their bright red wagon, pulled by their horse Ferdele. They had not yet reached their destination but the sun was about to set and they needed a place to stay. They realized that their options were either to spend the night under the stars and risk being attacked by robbers, or to travel to the closest village. Unfortunately, the closest village was the Village of Sorrow. They knew about its reputation, but it seemed a better idea than being attacked by robbers so they made their way there, with more than a little reluctance.

They found the local inn, and the innkeeper was ecstatic to discover that his overnight guest was none other than the famous Chazanov the Maggid. Chana and Nachum had little money so they offered to pay for their stay at the inn with what they had in abundance – stories and chicken soup. The innkeeper graciously accepted their offer.

The news spread throughout the village like wildfire. "Chazanov the Maggid has arrived in our village! Chazanov the Maggid has arrived in our village!" That evening, most of the villagers showed up at the inn. The place was jammed to the rafters. People were sitting on the porch and even on the street outside the inn. Long into the night, magical stories were told and Chana's delicious chicken soup was consumed. The inn hadn't been this busy for years.

The villagers were so enthralled with the stories, the soup, and the personalities of Chana and Nachum that they wanted them to reside permanently among them. The innkeeper proposed that they make the inn their home, with only a few conditions. He and his wife would continue to live at the inn, and Chana would continue to provide stories and soup. Chana and Nachum happily agreed with this plan.

It was a new beginning for the village. The economy improved and life started to blossom – all because of the stories and the soup. Before long, the Village of Sorrow became known as the Village of Joy.

Years later, Nachum died in his sleep. Chana was completely overcome with grief.

She blamed herself because the night before his death, Nachum had eaten a bowl of her chicken soup. She was sure that she had inadvertently killed him. The village elders told her that this was impossible, since everyone knew that her chicken soup had such healing properties and no one had ever died from consuming it. But her guilt was just too overwhelming. She could no longer bring herself to tell stories and cook soup, despite pleas from the villagers that she resume these highly valued activities.

Eventually, things in the village started to decline and the Village of Joy became known once again as the Village of Sorrow. Shortly afterwards, Chana died and all that remained of the village's better times were the memories.

Legend has it that if you visit the graves of Chana and Nachum late at night and pay close attention you will hear a wonderful story told by the wind and you will also experience the delicious aroma of Chana's chicken soup wafting through the air. And it is said that if you are feeling sad, are physically unwell, or have fallen on hard times, the story and the fragrance of the soup will instantly lift your spirits. ■

A Passover Wish

JUDY WEINRYB

On a snowy winter's morning, Sara Snyder stood in line at Starbucks, waiting patiently for her morning coffee. Her mind began to wander to a place far away from the chilly Toronto climate, as she imagined herself walking hand in hand on a tropical beach with her husband Steve.

She could hear the hypnotic sound of waves rolling in from the deep blue waters of the ocean and feel the texture of the soft, grainy sand under her feet. Sara was enjoying her fantasy when she was abruptly brought back to reality by a barista ready to take her order . Reflecting on her vision later in the day, she realized that it had actually been years since she and Steve had gone on a beach holiday, or any type of holiday in fact, without their children. At that moment, Sara decided that it was time they did

Unfortunately, it was Steve's busiest season at his law firm. "Maybe in the spring," he said, after she raised the idea, over dinner that evening. "Our annual conference is scheduled for mid-March. Sometime after that could definitely work." Sara began to count the days. She would try to be patient. What was another month or two, if she had waited this long?

Then something foreboding happened. The flyers for supermarket specials for Passover began to arrive in her mailbox. A case of concord grape juice for only $29.99, matzah at $12 for five boxes, and assorted brands of gefilte fish for only $4.99 a loaf. It was simply too much for her to bear, like a slap in the face, a dark reminder that it was time to start scrubbing and polishing. Sara would now have to be Wonder Woman - days in the office, afternoons driving car pools and shuffling the children to various activities, evenings in the kitchen and the supermarket. It was tiring just to think about it

"Steve", Sara declared emphatically after dinner a few days later, " We either make plans to get away for Passover or I'm going to have a complete meltdown." After mulling over her ultimatum, Steve agreed to take off the time. "I really do know how much this means to you, and I think it's a great idea" he told Sara.

"Our conference was a big success but I could use a break now too. Let's do it!" By the following week, arrangements had been made for an all-inclusive Kosher for Passover holiday for two at an upscale hotel in San Juan, Puerto Rico Admiring the photographs of the pools, the nightclub and the smooth, sandy beach, Sara was elated. The menu looked particularly appealing, since she would be wined and dined in style, with someone else doing the cooking for a change.

Jonathan and Mindy, Sara and Steve's teenage children, did not make a fuss about being left behind. Rather, they were excited about the prospect of spending Passover with their aunt and uncle in Montreal, something they had never done before. After dropping them off at school a few days later, Sara decided to pop into Yorkdale for a little pre-vacation clothes shopping and strolled around the mall looking at beachwear and sun hats. She realized that she was not far from the assisted living building where her grandmother lived, and decided to pay her a visit. She found her door unlocked and walked into her suite.

Fresh out of the bathtub, Bubbie Ruth was wearing her favourite flowered housecoat. She had kicked off her slippers and plunked her haggard feet onto an old brown ottoman. Her uncombed white hair fell loosely on her shoulders. "Sara honey, it's so nice of you to drop by," She looked lovingly at her only granddaughter, grateful for the unexpected visit.

"Sweetheart, you know how last year I was in the hospital and couldn't come to your seder? Well, this year not only will I be there but I'll make the best brisket you ever tasted." Her dark brown eyes, so sad since Zaidy Max passed away, seemed, if only for just one brief moment, to sparkle as she spoke Sara sat back in stunned silence. She held back tears and tried to smile. "Sounds wonderful Bubbie. Steve and I will see you at Mom's for dinner on Friday. We can discuss the Passover menu after dessert."

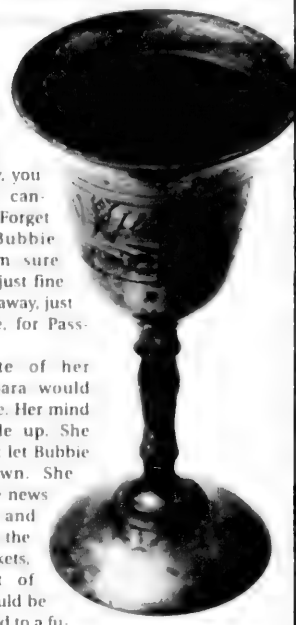
The next morning, over breakfast in her kitchen, Sara poured out her heart to her best friend Karen. "You know, it wouldn't be so bad if my sister hadn't moved to L.A. I don't know how I could have been so selfish."

Karen had recently split up with her second husband, who had thrown himself entirely into his career, leaving their relationship on the back burner. She understood that a second honeymoon, or even a third or fourth could be very beneficial to a marriage.



"Honey, you just can't cancel now. Forget about Bubbie Ruth. I'm sure she'll be just fine if you go away, just this once, for Passover."

In spite of her words, Sara would not budge. Her mind was made up. She could not let Bubbie Ruth down. She broke the news to Steve and cancelled the airline tickets, the cost of which could be transferred to a future flight. Fortunately, it was not too late to cancel the hotel arrangements either.

On Friday night, Bubbie Ruth arrived at her daughter's home looking remarkably well. Coming directly from her weekly hair appointment, she was wearing her blue linen suit, which she usually saved for special occasions. Sara's mother, Fay, liked having the family around for Sabbath dinner. It made her feel less lonely since she and Sara's father had gotten a divorce, two years earlier.

Fred Ginsberg, a man Fay had met at an art class she was taking, was joining them tonight.

They had been dating for a few months and Fay wanted him to meet her family. In addition, Carl, Sara's cousin who had recently returned from a year's sabbatical teaching philosophy at Berkeley, had dropped in. After the main course, the entire entourage, including Sara, Steve and the kids, retreated to the living room for dessert.

Bubbie Ruth was feeling nostalgic tonight. "Fred darling" she said to Fay's new boyfriend, "We used to live just around the block from here. Did you know that? Who would have thought that Brunswick Avenue would become so chic?" She laughed, as she picked up her coffee mug to wash down the rich chocolate mousse she'd just consumed with great gusto.

"When my Fay was growing up, we had a small cleaners on College Street." She continued, "It was a thriving business and gave us enough income to bring our baby up in the style to which she's become accustomed."

"Don't listen to her, Fred." Fay pleaded. "Mom, can we keep our opinions to ourselves tonight, please?" Maybe inviting him tonight had not been such a good idea.

"You know" Bubbie Ruth continued, "in those days we made everything from scratch – soup, fish, cakes, everything! My mother, may she rest in peace, brought recipes from Poland that were handed down over many generations. By the way, Carl," she added, directing her words towards her grandnephew, "did you know that she left her family home in Krakow all by herself to marry my father, who was waiting for her in Montreal? The first time she ever laid eyes on him was when she got off the train from Halifax. Boy, did people ever take chances in those days, eh?"

Carl, who was fascinated by this generous outpouring of family history, nodded his head enthusiastically.

Sara had heard Bubbie's stories time and time again. She loved to recount how she met Zaidy Max at Wallerstein's Ice Cream Parlour on Spadina Avenue, and how he saved every penny until he was able to bring over his brothers from Poland just in time to rescue them from certain death. Those ungrateful bastards, they didn't even count him in when they opened a clothing store that made them a fortune.

"You can never tell about people," Zaidy used to say. "My own family. Who would have thought?" It was one of Bubbie Ruth's favourite stories, Sara recalled, waiting for her to get to it.

What was Bubbie Ruth looking for, Sara wondered? Did she feel that by constantly talking about the past, she could go back and relive it? Was the upcoming seder even going to be real for her, or would she just imagine that she was back on Brunswick Avenue in the 1950s, sitting at the seder table with Zaidy Max, and her children?

Sara realized that her grandmother would not feel lonely if she and Steve were in Puerto Rico during the upcoming family seder. Her memories would be more than enough to keep her company. At that moment, Steve, who was sitting next to her on the sofa, squeezed her hand. She turned her head to catch him looking at her as though he could read her thoughts

"You know," he said quietly so as not to disrupt Bubbie Ruth's continuing monologue. "I got a call today from the travel agent that our airline tickets cannot be exchanged or refunded after all, so I think we're going to have to go on the holiday we planned. I checked with the hotel and they can still have us for Passover. Do you mind?"

Did she mind? She could hardly believe his words. She most certainly did not. Without the slightest hesitation, she jumped out of her seat to announce their plans to everyone in the room.

Before she could utter a word, Bubbie Ruth turned to her and said "Honey, those days were great but they're just memories now. I hope you don't mind, but I just got this terrific offer from Saul Weinstein, my next door neighbour in the building, to join him and his kids on a luxury cruise from Miami to Curacao for Passover. I'm sure Zaidy Max would understand. Even an old lady like me gets a little lonely sometimes. What do you think darling, should I take the package with the drinks included?" ■

DOROTHY GLICK

Erase if you can the black letters scrawled, dripping on the walls – levied at you (screaming at you); etched into the orbs of your eyes, and memory
(Jews out! Death to Jews!)

Erase if you can
those photos, the amorphous apparitions oozing from the movie screen chasing you home – crawling into bed with you to hound you for hours and then days, and still more – years!

Erase if you can
the cataloguing,
the notating, the filing…
the numbers; those millions engraved into nonentities that hold our consciences in terror and ignominy

Consider if you can that night…(Were there stars? I will ask) they came out of the shadows of trenches, though they were frightened
they lifted themselves into the light hands held out across the night…
they came across the lines towards each other singing their voices stronger than those voices that commandeered them the next day to murder

If – then and now

HOWARD KURLANDSKI

(with apologies to Rudyard Kipling)

If you can go to shul when all about you
Fill the air with talk, but have nothing substantive to say.
If you can trust in God, when all men doubt you
And still have enough inner sense to pray.
If you can keep your mind on heaven
While still managing to keep your feet on the ground
And tell the difference between matzah and leaven
By learning enough to keep your reasoning sound.
If you can engage yourself by learning Torah.
Yet not disengage yourself from your fellow man.
If you can separate yourself from lashon hara
And stop running to be an also-ran.
If you can begin, and not be afraid by starting
Or lose your way, and not be hampered by loss
If you can stand up straight at a tearful parting
And smile either way at a fateful toss.
If you can assist, when assistance is needed
And not mention a word of what you did.
If you can speak, and know that you'll be heeded
Not revealing hurts that should remain forever hid.
If you can motivate those around you
And know that when all is done
That doing right will remain a virtue,
And – what is more – you'll be a mensch, my son.

My Pet Goosey

LYNN SAND

It was going to be our first Passover in America in April 1925. Spring was unusually warm that year. The towering chestnut trees on McCaul Street were in full bloom. The squirrels and robins played hide-and-seek around the huge cone-shaped blossoms. I can almost smell the pungent aroma that filled the air and wafted skyward.

We had been separated from Papa for three l-o-n-g years and now he was going to conduct our first seder in our own rented house. I was jubilant. I was seven years old.

Papa, a pious soft-spoken man became a peddler because he would not desecrate the Sabbath. Papa's love of God and Torah made him oblivious to the materialistic world around him.

Mama, on the other hand, was very much aware of our poverty. But she never complained. She accepted her lot with grace and dignity. She was also able with unmatched skill to stretch 10 cents into a dollar. She could create and serve a Sabbath meal for the seven of us from one large capon. She would make fricassee, chopped liver and soup, and then bake the boiled chicken from the soup to whet the appetite of the most discriminating palate. Maybe it was because she was raised by a stepmother who was a rival to Cinderella.

For this, our first Passover together, Mama asked Papa for a goose. She wanted it at least two months before the holiday so that she could fatten him up. She claimed that goose fat when rendered down was far tastier than chicken schmaltz. It would also produce enough jars of fat to last her for months – possibly to the High Holy Days. The crisp greeven ground into the chopped liver would enhance the flavour beyond imagining. Then there were the goose feathers and down that would make an extra cushion or a small comforter for the expected baby. Another mouth to feed.

What surprised my innocence was how a petite woman like Mama could produce such large healthy beautiful babies and be able to nurse them for nine months or more.

I remember with her seventh and last baby, she had so much milk that when she had to wean her, she was able to nurse a stranger's infant because the mother was too ill.

Papa would give Mama the sun and the moon if he could. I'll never forget the day he brought her the goose. Mama's face lit up with pleasure. Papa's violet eyes sparkled like stars when Mama smiled.

The Goose that Laid the Magic Egg.

The goose was huge. I thought he was beautiful. Soft snow-white feathers, a long neck with an orange beak – even his feet were orange. I wanted to hold and caress him, but he made such a loud honking noise that it frightened me. He was too big for me to hold him anyway.

The next morning before I left for school, I went out to the back yard with a bowl of water for the goose. As soon as he saw me coming toward him he spread his great wings and began to flap them furiously as if he was about to take flight. He rushed around the yard. His loud strained honking sounded as if he was very frightened.

"Come on Goosey, don't be afraid of me" I spoke softly. "See I brought you some water. I'll just leave it here and you can drink it when you get thirsty." Poor Goosey, I thought, he must be very lonely, taken away from the farm and all his feathered friends.

I rushed home from school at lunchtime straight to the yard to see if Goosey drank his water. That's when I saw Mama stuffing grain down his wide open beak. He was twisting, squirming and honking trying to break away from her clutches.

"Mama! Mama, you're choking him Why are you forcing him to eat?" I cried, before I realized I was questioning her authority. "Papa never does that to Jake. He just puts down a pail with some grain and a bunch of hay in his stall and leaves him alone."

"Go inside and eat your lunch," she commanded, "And see that your sisters eat theirs. I made scrambled eggs you can all have with bread and butter, and there's bananas and milk."

I couldn't eat a thing. When Mama came in she looked flushed. I rushed out to see Goosey. I had to chase after him. He put up a terrible fight when I caught him. His strong wings scratched my face trying to get away from me. "Poor, poor Goosey, don't be afraid," I whispered in his ear. "I'll take care of you." I stroked his soft feathers and kissed him on the head. "We're gonna be friends. I'll bring you water every day and we'll walk around the yard."

I didn't watch Mama feed him after that But I would rush out after she fed him and tried to calm him down and place a fresh bowl of water for him

Soon he grew to trust me. It was wonderful to see him rush toward me – his outstretched wings flapping and honking just two times. Now he didn't sound angry. We became friends. He was my pet, my beautiful swan

After school I had more time to walk around the yard and talk to him. Once in a while he would stretch his long neck and honk, as if he understood what I said

All the time I was plagued with the knowledge that Mama was trying to fatten him up for the Passover meals. This gave me many nightmares. One night I woke the whole household with my cries

In my nightmare I saw the shoichet's sharp knife... "No, no!" I screamed... Papa and Mama came running in from their bedroom. Papa held me. I was in a cold sweat and trembling.

"Sha-sha mine kint," he whispered trying to calm me. Since we slept four in a bed, Mama thought maybe I got kicked and hurt. But I couldn't tell them about my dream.

Friday

LILY KOVAN

I was still in bed, half sleeping. The familiar noises from the kitchen woke me up. As always, my mother had an early start on Friday, so she could finish all the chores before Shabbat. I woke up feeling good. I loved the anticipation of having my whole family together around the table, having interesting discussions, maybe some jokes, and of course, a good meal, maybe even chicken.

I don't know how my mother managed to cook all the various dishes for Shabbat on kerosene. The cooking process on kerosene was very slow and she only had one burner. Well, somehow, we always had soup, a meat or chicken dish, rice or fried potatoes and cake. She always did it but she did have to have an early start.

I moved slowly and sat on the bed when I heard my mom say, "Are you up Lily, get up already. I need some help."

"I am up mom," I said.

I stood up and looked out the window. It was a typical March day, snow, drizzle and wind. The naked tree branches were shaking as if they were shivering from the cold wind.

"Are you ready Lily," yelled my mom again. "Get up already! What would the neighbours say if they walked in? Still in bed at this late hour!"

"Yes mom, I just have to brush my teeth and get dressed."

"I washed your dress last night. Check the hanger, it must be dry now."

The apartment where we lived had one large room, one smaller room and a kitchen. In one corner of the larger room were two single beds with a night table in between, where my brother Tamazi and I slept. The other end of the room had a desk which was shared by the two of us. Tamazi hardly did his homework. I could say that the desk was mine.

If the desk was occupied, one of us would use the round dining table, standing in the middle of the room with four chairs around it. Against the wall, there was a sofa, occasionally used for overnight visitors and the other side of the wall had a small closet that was shared by all of our family. We didn't have many clothes. We each had a few outfits for every day and one set of dressy clothing for going out to special occasions. So, it was common that we had to wash a set of clothes the night before to wear the next day. We frequently, dried the clothes by ironing them.

Throughout the winter, we hung the clothes on a rope that was going from one end of the room to the other. During the summer it was easier (except, when it rained.) We could hang things outside in the yard. I hated when the room was full of clothes hanging. It looked really ugly.

I reached out for my dress to see if it was dry. The dress was still slightly wet. I plugged in the iron to finish up drying my dress so that I could get ready and help my mom with the chores. I was lucky. I had time off from school due to spring break.

"Are you ready, Lily?" called my mom from the kitchen again. "I want you to buy three loaves of bread and some cheese, perhaps a few bottles of Borjomi (natural mineral water from the town of Borjomi in Georgia).

Luckily, your dad had a pay day two days ago. I had enough money to buy chicken for Shabbat yesterday," said my mom joyfully.

I finished ironing, got dressed and walked into the kitchen to see what my mom was up to. You could not have been too quiet, walking on our floor. Every step taken made the floor sound as if it was squirting from some horrible pain.

"Hi mom," I said and looked around the kitchen. It was a tiny little space, just enough to have a kerosene and one small cabinet, but the smell of the cooking filled the whole apartment with an enticing aroma.

"Hurry up," mom said. "We still have to clean the apartment, finish shopping and set up the table. I invited the professor from across the street tonight. Poor man, he is so lonely, no wife, no children..."

I took some money to go shopping and walked out of the door, when I saw our regular Friday visitor standing in front of the door to receive his weekly Friday charity. I grabbed the loose change that mom always had on the table for the poor.

My mother never felt poor. She was always taking joy from having a loving husband, friends and family and of course me and my brother.

She knew there was someone else poorer than her. ■

Waiting for the Minyan

LARRY FINKELMAN

The faithful gather on the Sabbath day, some to gossip some to pray.
Old men stand and mill around,
waiting for the minyan.

There is nothing heard in the quiet air, congregants pause, some to stare
as the rabbi begins to chant,
waiting for the minyan.

He takes a moment to put down the book.
Around the shul he casts a look.
Mostly ghosts now sit on benches,
waiting for the minyan.

Past the memorial lights and into the pall,
the closing door echoes in the hall:
one more arrives and that makes six,
waiting for the minyan.

They're out playing golf on this sunny day, gone to market or making hay.
I don't begrudge them that, but still, we are waiting for the minyan.

A few nod off then come awake.
The sound of feet begin to snake up the stairs; that makes eight,
waiting for the minyan.

So what's for kiddush? Did someone say?
Lox and bagels to make the day?
And cheesecake too? Ever hopeful,
waiting for the minyan.

The rabbi's service draws to an end.
Didn't make it once again.
It's been five weeks and still we are,
waiting for the minyan.

BENA SINGER

It was on a Friday afternoon two hours before Shabbat. The weather mild for this time in January. I got off the bus. The sidewalks were extremely icy. I slowly shuffled along, my boots scraping the pavement to prevent me from falling. A well-built woman was walking beside me.

"It's very slippery," I said. She nodded and asked me where I was going. "Come" she said, "take my arm and we will cross together." "Do you have to go in that direction?" I inquired. "No", she replied. "But that's all right."

I took her arm and with an air of confidence, I walked briskly alongside her. When we reached the other side I said, "I am sure you have earned more than one mitzvah today."

She smiled and commented, "Hashem has been very good to me and I want to honour His commandments." I let go of her arm, looked into her eyes and said, "how fortunate you are to have this understanding."

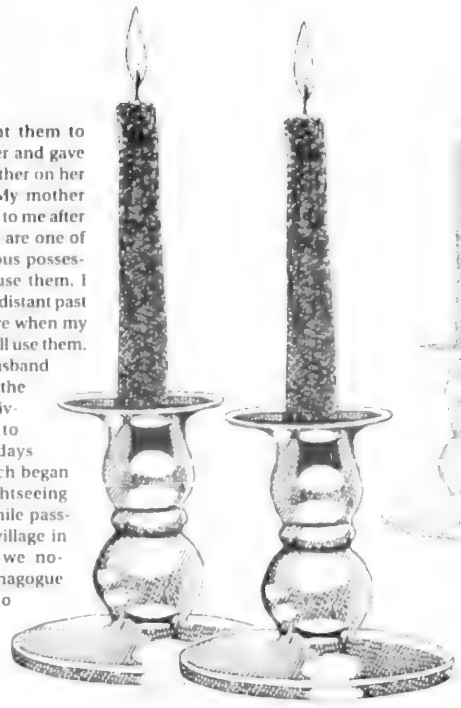
Candlesticks

RHODA WISE

One of my earliest memories was watching my mother light candles on Shabbat. I remember the Sabbath table set with a snow-white tablecloth, the good china and gleaming silverware. I especially loved the silver candlesticks with the candles glowing in them. I knew they were very special because my mother polished them every week and used them on Friday nights and Jewish holidays.

They were about 12 inches high and covered with worn down engraved flowers. There was a sort of umbrella shaped structure over the base and just under the tulip-shaped top. The stem between the two umbrella shapes ballooned out into one large and one small shaped urn. The design was unusual. I had never seen it anywhere else.

When I was older, my mother explained to me that they had originally belonged to my grandmother's mother, my great-grandmother, who had lived in Lithuania. She gave them to my grandmother when she married. My grandmother brought them to Canada with her and gave them to my mother on her wedding day. My mother passed them on to me after I married. They are one of my most precious possessions. When I use them, I feel a link to my distant past and to the future when my own children will use them.



In 2001, my husband and I went on the March of the Living. We went to Poland a few days before the march began to do some sightseeing on our own. While passing through a village in the northeast we noticed an old synagogue and stopped to look at it. Inside was a small museum. On display were various artifacts showing what Jewish life had been like in this area before the Nazis had destroyed it. We entered and I immediately spotted the candlesticks. They were identical to the ones in my home. I realized we were near the Lithuanian border and probably near the village where my grandmother had grown up. The unique design of the candlesticks must have been indigenous to this area

I started to cry and could not stop. I felt an incredibly strong connection to my family who had lived there and could actually feel their presence. I thought about how far our candlesticks had travelled, how often they had been used, and how they had survived time and space. I felt privileged to have somehow arrived here to be able to experience my roots. It was as if I had been destined to come. ■

Rosh Hashanah

ROSALIE CHAD

Bessie lay in bed watching the new day erase the shadows. She glanced over to Abraham's bed on the other side of the night table. He was snoring still. His mouth was open, his cheeks were sunken. Perhaps if she were lucky she would manage to wash and dress before he opened his eyes.

Gingerly she manoeuvred herself into a sitting position wincing as she stretched her legs. Her feet found their soft slippers in a mixture of pain and relief as she triumphantly reached the floor. She realized she didn't have much time to arrange her dinner for the family.

Above the morning news she heard Abraham walking. Thud, shuffle, thud, shuffle. She heard the bathroom door close. Her potato kugel, carrot tsimmis and chicken soup filled the room with the fragrance of parsley and dill. The escaping steam frosted the windows.

She set the table for breakfast. Glancing at the clutter she was overcome by fatigue. Abraham would complain. He liked a neat kitchen. He liked to have his orange juice, his three minute egg, his hot half milk, half coffee ready when he reached the table. "Fifty years this May," she thought. As she poured the orange juice his voice jarred her, "Good morning, dear."

He was cheerful. "I see you were busy."

"Just my Rosh Hashanah preparations." She put the egg in the boiling water and checked the time.

"A good Yom Tov," he said. He kissed her on the forehead.

"The same to you."

"After you clean the kitchen, I'll help you set the table," he said. "Josh and Debbie coming?"

She nodded. She loved it when her son and daughter-in-law came to dinner. Everything became so festive. And this year their granddaughter, Barbie and her family were coming as well. She could hardly wait. She found it amazing that Barbie, beautiful Barbie, was a mother. Bessie sighed.

Abraham picked up his paper. No more conversation. They sat down for breakfast. She watched him drink his orange juice. She wished he could wipe his mouth. Couldn't he feel that yellow foam hovering over his lip? She suddenly hurried from the table to put Abraham's egg on to boil. To her amazement there it was bubbling gently. She removed it from the water hoping it was soft. She watched him tap the shell lightly. She glanced with satisfaction at the round shiny challah and the honey cake she had baked last night. She used the same recipes from her Hadassah cookbook each year.

"Bessie, aren't you listening?" Abraham was pointing to the radio. "He's talking about the weather."

"...As usual the Jewish New Year will be celebrated with unseasonable temperatures, sunny with a high in the low 80s."

Abraham smiled complacently.

"Would you like more toast Abraham?"

"I've had it," he said. "I'll go downstairs for the mail."

"Good, we should have lots of cards," Bessie smiled. She watched Abraham limp toward the front door. Years before his accident he might have sprinted out the door. They used to win dance contests when they were young. She was ashamed of her impatience toward him this morning. "Good Yom Tov" she called as he left the apartment.

He waved.

At 6 p.m. the table looked perfect. "A picture," said Abraham. The silver candlesticks and the delicate wine glasses gleamed under the crystal chandelier. The round twisted challah rested on a silver tray covered with a doily. The burgundy Manishewitz wine in its cut glass decanter cast a rosy haze on the table.

Abraham had put on his best suit. He no longer went to the synagogue. He davened at home. It was too far away to walk so many blocks. He was hungry. The cooking smells had tempted him all day. "Shouldn't they be here by now?" asked Abraham.

They'll be here soon," said Bessie. "Maybe they had to wait for Barbie."

"Barbie?"

"She's visiting Josh and Debbie for the week with Bill and the baby. We wanted to surprise you." She lowered her voice, giggling, "we'll see our great-grandson."

Abraham flushed. "Oh, boy! So that's why all the fuss!"

"No more than any other year," said Bessie, huffily.

"So now I'll put on two more place settings."

Abraham started to sing softly, My Yiddishe Mamma.

Bessie started rearranging the table. Abraham continued, "How I long to see her now."

"My gefilte fish came out especially tasty this year," said Bessie.

"Her jewels were in her baby's smile," sang Abraham.

Bessie felt light-headed with anticipation. "My dessert! Wait 'til they taste my torte. I really outdid myself."

The phone rang. "Answer it Abraham. I'll change my dress." Bessie hurried into the bedroom. She wished she could lie down for a few minutes. No time.

Abraham's voice was hoarse and loud. "What do you mean you aren't coming?"

Bessie caught her breath. She must have heard wrong. She picked up the extension.

"The baby is sick. The doctor says he has swollen glands and an earache." The voice was Joshua's.

"Oh," Bessie gasped.

"Hi, mom."

"You can't bundle him up and bring him?"

"It's warm out. You're driving in the car."

"Barbie is afraid."

"So you and Debbie can come?"

"How can we?" Joshua asked. "Barbie and Bill are visiting with us."

"So how will you celebrate Rosh Hashanah?" Bessie tried to keep the plaintive tone out of her voice.

"Debbie said we can order dinner from a caterer."

"Isn't too late?" Rosh Hashanah is tonight."

"No. Debbie said she knows who to call," Joshua's voice had an edge to it.

It was almost as if she were disappointing him. She tried to sound casual, "I made dinner for you." Then adamantly, "Barbie and Bill should understand!"

"They do. But how can we leave them after they've travelled all day yesterday to get here?" Joshua asked.

"Oh," Bessie could barely hear her own voice.

Joshua continued, "Barbie will call you later, mom. She sends her love to you both. We'll all try to visit before they leave for home."

"Maybe we should go there?" Abraham broke in.

"No, no, we'll wait for the visit." Bessie said.

"If we can..."

"OK," Bessie interrupted Joshua.

"Look mom, dad...I have to go." There was a brief silence. We'll call you tonight," he added.

"Yes," said Bessie lamely. "At least let us know how the baby is." But Joshua had hung up.

Abraham and Bessie stood looking at the table. The resonance of the liturgical music filled the room.

"Tonight is Rosh Hashanah, Bessie" Abraham said. He leaned over and whispered, "Happy New Year, dear." He kissed her warmly and hugged her holding her close.

"Happy New Year, dearest," said Bessie in a surge of feeling.

"Let's have a little toast," said Abraham lifting the wine decanter. His hand shook slightly as he poured the wine. Bessie held her breath. The decanter fell from Abraham's hand. It shattered the wine glass. The wine spread over the white damask cloth. The broken decanter rolled onto the floor. The wine formed a crimson pattern on the soft beige carpet. Bessie and Abraham clung together silent and motionless.■

All Alone for Passover

MARVIN ZYLBER

Is this what my Passover seders have become?
I sit alone at my seder table,
My place setting is only for one.

My family and friends are long gone
Or moved on,
Or far too busy,
Or think the seders are just a drag on

The Jewish community is small and Passover is upheld by a few,
Many said this day would come and others said it was nothing new

Still I called out to my neighbours,
My colleagues,
Even to strangers that were Jews,
"Come" I said "to my seders" but nobody came, not even to schmooze.

When I think back to my youth
When seders were not uncouth,
My family came from far and wide and fed their sweet tooth.

Times have changed and some still complain,
That Passover food is very costly, far too out of their range,
But I said my seder meals are absolutely free,
Just enjoy it, nothing to do, nor arrange

Still I am all alone again for the Passover seders
It is lonely, sad and hard
The only ones now at my seder tables
Are just Eliyahu, me and God.

NORMA BARKIN

From precious remnants of a mad experiment,
A small, intrepid army, by miracle was sent,
Emerging out of tortured loss and stolen youth,
To vow that hate would never triumph over truth.

They mustered all unbroken will and made the choice
To lay bare anguished memories and give them voice.
Those shattered beyond speech were counted with the rest.
Cold numbers, mutely worn, would silently attest.

They marched and spoke and sang and wrote, revisiting their pain.
Then, when it seemed their strength was spent, arose and marched again.
In ghost-like camps, or bustling schools, they had their message heard,
As eager minds and feeling hearts recorded every word.

Each offered grisly evidence, with nothing spared,
Remembering another world where no one cared,
And men performed unholy tasks in fiendish haste,
While deeply loved and treasured souls were rendered waste.

This testimony will continue to defy
The fools and monsters who continue to deny,
What was so undeniably man's vilest crime,
And shine the light of truth upon that evil time.

Over the Rainbow

JULIE BERGMAN

It was a gloomy, rainy, yucky day. Ethan pressed his nose to the window. He watched as the thick, grey clouds crept across the sky, sprinkling the ground with tiny drops of water. "When will it stop raining?" he asked. "When can I go out and play?"

Joey sat cross-legged on the floor, fitting the pieces of a giant puzzle. He looked out the window and shrugged. "I dunno."

Ethan lifted his finger and traced a raindrop as it zigzagged down the windowpane. "Why is the sky so dark, Joey?" he asked.

"I dunno," Joey answered.

"Joey? Where does the sun go when it rains?" Ethan asked.

Joey shook his head. "I dunno!" he snapped. "Stop asking so many questions! I don't know the answers!"

The afternoon dragged on. Ethan remained by the window. He patiently waited for the sky to clear. Finally, the sun peeked out from behind the clouds and a beautiful rainbow stretched out across the sky.

"Look, Joey!" Ethan shouted. "Look at the rainbow! How does the sky make such wonderful colours?"

Joey lay on the floor, flipping through the pages of a comic book. He looked out the window and shrugged. "I dunno."

"Where does a rainbow come from, Joey?" Ethan asked.

"I dunno," Joey answered.

"Joey? Where do you think the rainbow ends?" Ethan asked.

Joey shook his head. "I dunno!" he snapped. "Stop asking so many questions! Only God know the answers to all of your questions!"

"But where is God? Ethan asked. "Can you help me find him?"

Joey sighed and joined his little brother by the window. "I'm not sure, but I think God lives over the rainbow," Joey said. "I guess that if you reach the end of the rainbow, then God will be there."

Ethan's eyes widened. His face beamed with delight. "Oh boy!" he exclaimed. "And do you think he can answer all of my questions?"

"I think so," Joey replied. "God knows everything. He should be able to answer all your millions of questions."

Ethan raced to the closet. He slipped on his raincoat and rain boots. "How do I get over the rainbow, Joey?" he asked. "Do I walk there?"

"Oh no," Joey said. "You can't walk. That would take too long. By the time you get there, the rainbow will be gone."

Ethan kicked off his rain boots and laced up his sneakers. "Then I'll run," he said. "I'm a really fast runner, aren't I?"

"You can't run," Joey said. "The rainbow is too far away. You'll be running for days."

Ethan thought for a minute. Then he took off his raincoat and strapped on a bicycle helmet. "If I can't walk and I can't run, then I'll take my bike. I can pedal quickly to see God, can't I?"

"You can't ride your bike," Joey said. "You still have your training wheels. You're much too wobbly on your bike and Mom would never let you go."

Ethan threw off the bicycle helmet. "If I can't walk and I can't run and I can't ride my bike, then I'll call Zaidie. Zaidie's car drives really fast. He can drive me, can't he, Joey?"

"I guess so," Joey said. "And Zaidie will be here soon. He's coming for dinner."

Ethan sat outside and anxiously waited on the front step for Zaidie.

He bubbled with excitement. Ethan could not wait to meet God. So many questions filled his head and soon he would have all of his answers. God knew all of the answers.

The warm sunshine smiled down on Ethan. He lifted his face and breathed in the fresh smell that the rain left behind. Searching the length of the sky, Ethan cried out, "What happened to the rainbow?" He jumped up and circled all around. He looked in every direction.

"Where is God's rainbow?" he shouted as tears streaked down his face.

Just then, Zaidie's car pulled up. He rushed to Ethan's side. "What's wrong, my boy?" he begged.

"The rainbow is gone," Ethan answered. "It just disappeared. I should have walked or ran or taken my bicycle. I may be a little wobbly on my training wheels, but I know I could have made it over. How will I ever see God now, Zaidie?"

Zaydie raised an eyebrow. "See God?" he asked.

"Yes," Ethan replied. "I have a million questions and only God knows the answers."

Zaidie placed his arm around Ethan's shoulder. "Oh, Ethan," he replied. "God doesn't live over the rainbow."

"He doesn't?" Ethan asked, brushing away his tears.

"No," answered Zaidie. "God doesn't live in any one place. God is everywhere. He is all around us. You may not see him, but if you try hard enough, you can feel him."

"Like in my heart or when I look at a rainbow?" Ethan asked.

"Exactly," Zaidie answered.

"But if I can't see God, how can he answer all of my questions?" Ethan asked.

"Well," Zaidie began, "God helps us all to grow. As we grow, we learn. And when we learn, we start finding the answers to our questions."

Ethan thought about that and nodded. "Zaidie?" he asked. "Do you know how the sky makes a rainbow with such wonderful colours or where a rainbow ends?"

Zaidie studied the sky and shrugged. "I dunno," he answered.

"I don't know either," Ethan said. "I guess we are both still growing and learning. But, don't worry, Zaidie. One day, God will help us find the answers to all our millions of questions."

"See, my boy?" Zaidie laughed. "You are already growing and learning. Now, let's see you ride your bicycle. Keep practising and you'll have those training wheels off in no time."

"And I'll be ready to catch the next rainbow!" Ethan cried as he ran inside to grab his helmet. ■

CBB of Ottawa adds Drew Rothman to its team of directors

1935 · 9015

CAMP B'NAI BRITH

CELEBRATING 80 YEARS OF SMILES AND BLACH

On Wednesday March 4th, Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa announced the addition of Drew Rothman as an Assistant Director.

"I'm thrilled about Drew joining us at CBB of Ottawa this summer. I believe that he will complement an already strong leadership team as the camp continues to move in a forward direction," said camp Director, Jonathan Pivnick.

Drew is well known to the Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa community. He spent 15 summers, beginning as a nine year old camper in the A-Boy unit. After finishing his camper career, he rose through the camp ranks as a cabin counselor, specialty head, and eventually assumed Head of Waterfront duties to cap off his working career at CBB of Ottawa. Drew and his wife Sarah Rosenhek, whom he met at CBB of Ottawa, have a five-year old son, Nate, and a two-year old daughter, Rose. They will all be up at camp with him this summer to share the experience.

"I grew up with the Rothman family. I am thrilled to be getting the opportunity to partner with Drew in creating the same life changing camp experiences, building of friendships and memories, we had as campers!" commented Assistant Director Cindy Presser Benedek.

With an education background, he initially obtained his B.A. (Philosophy) from Concordia University, before pursuing a Master's degree in education from SUNY Posdam. Drew strongly represents CBB of Ottawa's three main communities: An Ottawa native, he has been teaching English, Mathematics, and Science for the past 10 years at Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and the Heschel Day School, both in Toronto, and at Akiva School in Montreal.

Drew understands that some of the most valuable learning experiences happen outside of the classroom. He recognizes that participating in camp life offers children tremendous opportunities for personal growth, making new friendships, acquiring leadership-development skills, and having the chance to discover their identity as individuals.

"I see there being great relationship between my work as teacher, and as Assistant Director –it's a way to bridge learning that happens for children both in and outside the classroom. Children mature so much during the course of an academic year, but the power that a few weeks of camp can have on a child also cannot be understated!" says Rothman.

Drew is currently in his fourth year of teaching at the Akiva School in Montreal, where he constantly encourages his students to express themselves as individuals. At CBB of Ottawa, Drew plans to communicate this very same message to campers of all age groups. He is looking forward to encouraging campers to try new experiences that will expand their horizons.

The Camp's Board of Directors is thrilled with this new addition. "Jewish summer camping is both an extension, and for some, an alternative to more traditional modes of Jewish education. To add a senior staff member from the Jewish day school community will only enhance our continuing commitment to produce the Jewish community leaders of tomorrow" said Board of Directors Chair Michael Polowin.

MARVIN HERSHORN

I met her in a Jerusalem hotel. She was stunningly beautiful. Her angelic smile disarmed me. I was fixated by her beauty. She was a nun, wearing a traditional habit – tunic, a white coif, a scapular and a cowl. A symbol of giving herself to God.

"You're from Quebec," I said in my best French. "Yes, our order is located in Quebec City."

I was born in Saguenay, in the Lac St. Jean region of Quebec.

She replied, "The most beautiful part of the province."

"Are you here for the first time?" I inquired.

"Yes, the sisters are here for the first time. We are all new. We will visit the holy sights. We believe that life is very fragile. Each jewelled sunlit moment must be cherished. Jerusalem is the place where we find solace and peace. If darkness comes, I see God's light in the holy city."

Homespun epistles redolent with rural Quebec eloquence. Her irrepressible optimism burned brightly. "What is your occupation, may I ask?"

"I am a teacher," I said, "visiting Israel with students from Dawson College in Montreal.

"We're part of an Israel travel learning program. We spend two weeks on kibbutz, then travel the country. Travel education is experiential, on the ground learning. We climb Gamla in the Golan Heights where we study Josephus' The Jewish Wars. Josephus' narration of the Battle of Gamla comes alive. As we watch the eagles soar overhead, sitting on the battle site we're back to 67 CE experiencing the fall of Gamla, vicarious spectators.

"So much violence, so many innocent deaths…you could feel the carnage. It's exhilarating learning – passionate, empathetic, painful and introspective. You feel the battle through a kind of geographical osmosis. Subliminal cellular memory for the students and teachers, who by chance all happen to be Jewish.

"It is a throwback to our ancestry, the pain of cyclical oppression. History comes to life when we are on site."

"I can see that you are a passionate teacher," she said.

She touched my shoulder. "Bless you. You are doing the work of God."■

When a Daughter Leaves the Shtetl

FIONA GOLD KROLL

In 1908 Sheva embarks on the most important journey of her life.

She crosses the cobblestone street and cuts through the village square on her way to Rivka's house. It's spring. Green leaves unfold from sticky brown buds on trees and yellow daffodils mingle with blades of grass, bowing to one another in the gentle breeze. It looks peaceful enough until a black cloud appears in the sky like the pogroms that send Jews fleeing in fear when thugs shatter windows and ransack homes. Just after Yankel's birth Moshe decides they must leave the shtetl, and he makes his way to England. Now, after three long years of separation, Sheva counts the days until they are together again.

Sheva and Rivka grew up together. They laughed and cried together and today while sipping hot tea, reminisce about childhood adventures. The clock on the mantel ticks in the background. Sheva glances at the time, stands up, brushes off her long skirt and drapes her shawl around her shoulders.

"Rivka, I could spend hours talking, but I must go, I have to pack. Promise me you'll write?"

"I will — I promise."

They hug each other so tight Sheva can barely breathe. She kisses Rivka's tear stained cheeks.

"Look after Lazer and the children," Sheva says.

She holds out her hand to Yankel.

"Come Tatala, let's go home."

Together, they walk past the little wood frame shul where Sheva davens upstairs on Shabbat with the other women.

She pokes her head in the shop next door and says good-bye to Motel the butcher. Not that his meat was ever good. Once Sheva marched into his store and slapped a piece of cooked brisket on the counter.

"You call this a piece of meat, Motel? It's tough like leather!"

Tiny, fearless Sheva is no pushover.

She walks around the corner, down the gravel road, past the well. Yankel kicks pebbles into the ditch, just as Sheva did as a child. In the distance she sees her father, sitting outside the house on his old wooden chair. Face drawn and pale, he strokes his red beard and pushes his black kippah back and forth on his head. Yankel runs, and climbs on his lap.

"Tatti, are you alright?" says Sheva.

Her father wraps his arms around Yankel and kisses his cheeks.

"I wish you would leave him here with Mameh and me. You're going to live in an unknown world. Will he study Torah, will he attend yeshiva?"

"Tatti, Yankel is my son. I could never leave without him. I don't know what the future holds, but you have my word, Moshe and I will raise our children as honest Jews."

Just then, her mother steps outside.

"So, did you ask her?" she says.

"Mameh — how could you even imagine I would leave Yankel behind?"

"Shush, let's not argue. The soup is hot, the bread warm. Come inside and eat before the food gets cold," says her mother.

Sheva sits down and looks around the table at her brothers and sisters and wonders if she will see them again. Maybe they'll come to England. Life is full of maybe's, she thinks.

That night, after she tucks Yankel into bed, Sheva folds the few clothes she is taking with her and puts them on top of the dresser. Tired from the emotion of the day, she lies on the bed beside her son and pulls the feather comforter over the two of them. Her eyes close and she tries to imagine her Moshe. She reaches out to touch his face. Soon we'll be together again. Yankel sighs when Sheva pulls him into her. She strokes his hair, and kisses his forehead before her head sinks into the pillow.

Sheva wakes with a start. Paper burns, kindling crackles as her father stokes the wood stove. She gets up and pulls the lace curtain back from the window. It is still dark outside. She splashes water on her face. Hurry, we have a train to catch. Yankel stirs and rubs his eyes. She washes his hands and face and helps him dress. Half asleep, neither one of them can eat, it's too early.

"At least have a hot drink," her mother says, throwing her hands in the air in frustration.

Sheva lays their clothes in a clean linen sheet with two loaves of bread for the journey and ties the ends together in a bundle. She buttons up Yankel's coat and wraps herself in a shawl.

"Have you got all your tickets?"

"Yes, Tatti I do," she smiles.

She closes the old door to the house and rubs her fingers over dents and cracks in the wood. Several are from age, others from the hoodlums who beat down the door, just to scare them from time to time. Tatti turns the key. The lock clicks. Sheva knows she will never return.

In the early morning darkness, the four of them walk to the train station in silence. They sit down on the bench beside the tracks. Yankel yawns and snuggles with his grandfather. Slowly dawn breaks, birds chirp and the rising sun brightens the sky with pink and mauve shadows chasing night clouds over the horizon.

Suddenly the quiet is broken by a harsh whistle. A black engine rumbles down the tracks, spewing white smoke from its funnel like an angry bull. Yankel buries his head in Sheva's lap and covers his ears. The train clatters into the station, and stops with a hiss of steam and screeching brakes.

Sheva hugs her mother.

"Good-bye Mameh. Take care of yourself and make sure everyone helps you next Pesach."

She turns to her father and looks into his blue eyes, moist with sadness. Her beloved Tatti the most wonderful father, she could hope for – pious, patient, kind and caring.

"Look after you and Mameh," she says, tears rolling down her face.

He hugs her tight and kisses her forehead.

"Go. Be well – all of you."

She takes Yankel's hand and climbs on the train. They sit by a window and when the train begins its slow chug out of the station, Yankel stands on his seat and waves good-bye to his Bubbie and Zaidie.

They travel all day, stopping in Vienna at night. Sheva knows the two loaves of bread will not be enough to feed them for the entire journey, so they spend the night at the Jewish shelter where they eat and rest. In the morning, they board a train to Bremen, and finally embark on the ship. It takes two nights to cross the wild North Sea without food other than the bread Sheva carries with her. She sings songs, tells Yankel stories in Yiddish and cradles him in her arms until they both fall asleep exhausted.

Moshe paces on the wharf waiting for Sheva and Yankel to disembark at the London docks. His anxious eyes search faces on the crowded deck. Then he sees them walking down the gangway and when they reach the bottom, he scoops up Yankel in his arms and hugs and kisses Sheva. She removes her head scarf and runs her hand through the soft waves in her hair.

"Where's your sheitel?" he asks.

"I don't remember."

Sheva tilts her face to the clear blue sky and soaks up the warmth from the sun. She looks at Moshe, smiles and together my grandparents and uncle walk hand in hand with hope for a better life in England. ■

Cooking for the Holidays

RHODA WISE

With Passover approaching, I have been reminiscing about how we celebrated the Jewish holidays when I was growing up. The first thing I thought of was food and cooking.

I remembered my mother and her mother spending an entire day preparing gefilte fish for the seders. A few days before cooking this dish, my grandfather would go to the fishmonger and carefully select the various kinds of fish needed. My mother and her mother, my bubbie, would spend the day grinding, shaping, seasoning, boiling and then baking the fish.

The house smelled fishy for days afterwards.

Years later, when my grandparents were quite old, my husband, Ralph, would drive my grandfather to the fishmongers. Then my bubbie, my mother and I would make the fish in my home.

Bubbie, now seated in a chair, carefully seasoned the fish and directed my mother and me on the preparations. I would do all the cleaning up. When we brought the platter of fish to the holiday table, there was always a great deal of discussion on whether it was too sweet or salty. Inevitably, it was proclaimed delicious. My grandfather would then stand up and proudly say, "I bought the fish."

I still serve gefilte fish on holidays, but now that my mother and grandmother are no longer here I buy it ready-made, but I always feel guilty for not making it.

On Yom Kippur, my mother always invited our family and friends to break the fast. One of the traditional dishes she served was yeast buns from a recipe my grandmother had brought from Lithuania. This took two days to make, one day to prepare the yeast dough and let it rise, and the second to shape, fill and bake the buns. When my mother was too old to continue hosting breaking the fast, my daughter Heidi took it on. A week or two before the event, she and my mother would make the buns and put them in the freezer.

My mother now sat in a chair and directed Heidi on the preparations. They only made yeast buns for this occasion and everyone took a package of them home. My mother died eight years ago but Heidi has continued this tradition and hosts breaking the fast complete with yeast buns every year.

"I feel like she is with me and supervising the preparations," Heidi often tells me "I feel very close to her at these times."

At Purim, when my four grandsons were young, I would bring them and my mother, who they called Go-go Evie, to my house and we would make hamentashen together. Go-Go Evie, seated in a chair directed everybody. The four little boys, all with aprons tied around them stood on chairs around the kitchen counter taking turns cracking the eggs, cutting the butter, mixing the dough, putting in the fillings and shaping the tri-corned hats. I let them fill half of the pastries with chocolate chips and Smarties because the children really did not like prunes. After baking them, we would deliver the hamentashen to relatives and friends.

I realize that our family has received a wonderful legacy. Cooking for the holidays has become full of traditions, stories and rituals that are woven into the threads of our lives today. The traditional foods we cooked together over the years were recipes to connect us to our family and to past generations as well as to a Jewish community that is worldwide and goes back thousands of years. ■

My older sister blurted out, "You know what's wrong with her? She's upset because you're pushing grain down the goose's throat. She thinks you're choking him trying to make him fat for Pesach, and that we're going to eat him."

Goldie was mean that way. A real snitch-cat. Mama said, "Go back to sleep all of you."

Later when all was quiet, everyone was back in their bed, I could hear Mama through the thin wall say, "Leibkeh, I think you should check the mezuzah on the children's door. Maybe it's worn out. Rifkaleh shouldn't have such bad dreams."

The next morning when I went to see Goosey he wasn't there to greet me. I rushed into the shed and found him sitting on a patch of straw. He honked, flapped his wings when he saw me but remained sitting. I rushed back to the house.'

"Mama, Mama! Something's wrong with Goosey." We both ran back to the shed. She put her hand underneath him and to our great surprise found an egg. I knew chickens laid eggs but I didn't know a goose could too. My eyes almost bulged out of their sockets when I saw how big it was. Mama was very pleased.

> I knew chickens laid eggs, but I didn't know a goose could too.

Back in the house she said, "Kinderlech, we're all gonna have lunch from this one egg." She could do that. She was happy.

"Mama," I asked, "Is this like a miracle? Like when God gave manna from heaven to the people in the desert when they were very hungry? That's what our teacher in Sunday School told us. So then, Mama, if Goosey can lay an egg every day you won't have to buy eggs anymore. You wouldn't want to kill him for Pesach would you Mama? Would you?" She looked at me surprised. But she didn't say a word.

With tears streaming down my face I rushed out to hug Goosey who was running around the yard honking like crazy. He sounded wild. Even worse than the first day. I couldn't catch him. I think he was very upset because Mama took his egg.

My older sister, the prima donna, came out after me and shouted, "What's the matter with you? You big cry baby. You upset Ma."

"You mind your own business. You're so mean. All you care about is yourself. You're just mad because maybe now you won't have Goosey for Pesach."

Several days later, at our supper table, Papa said to Mama in Yiddish (they always spoke in Yiddish to each other), "You know Hitzaleh," his voice always just above a whisper, "When I told George Henry that the goose laid eggs, he said had he realized the goose was not a gander, he wouldn't have sold it to me. But he told me that he'd be happy to pay me three times the price I paid him, because you took such good care of it." Papa was looking at me all the time he was talking to Mama.

My head kept turning from Papa to Mama. I could hardly believe my ears, when Mama said, "You know Leibkeh, I was getting very tired feeding that goose. It was putting up such a fight. It was wearing me out taking up too much of my time. Anyway, the extra money you are getting will be a godsend. The children all need new shoes for Pesach."

I rushed over to hug and kiss Papa. I whispered in his ear, "Papa, now I'll be able to see Goosey when I go to the farm with you in the summertime won't I? And you know what? I'm gonna tie an orange ribbon around his neck so I'll know it's my Goosey. Be sure to tell the farmer never to take it off."

"Yes, mine kint," he said, and patted my head affectionately. Then I went to Mama. I know she didn't believe in showing physical tenderness, but I hugged and kissed her too and said, "Thank you Mamishie." I knew she loved me, even though she brushed me aside and said, "Leibkeh, make sure you bring me two large rock hens for Pesach. They make the best chicken soup."■

As families gather around the seder table to share the story of the Exodus – from generation to generation – let us reflect on the journey from slavery to freedom and celebrate the peace we enjoy and cherish as Canadians.

"But you, whenever you pray, go into your own room

Knotted at each corner, worn by Jews
With pious conviction, furtive language and coded signals
In prayer, a shawl handed down from my grandfather, a shawl that was warm and embracing
A symbol of inclusive unconditional love
Universal, bringing the sense of sacred in daily life
The shawl wrapped him, enfolded him
Embraced him and gave him comfort
He was affirmed and uplifted with solace and peace
Given wings to soar above his troubles
His age was the impediment, a demographic architecture
Laced with illuminating self-awareness
Understanding that self-knowledge is not redemptive
Shaped with compassionate empathy
He displayed a brooding transparent intelligence
Ensorcelled by quiet sophistication of transformative prayers
He remained a sole avatar of his people's traditions
Of a righteousness signature persona
The winter of his life seems to have taken a firm grip on him
Tight and suffocating, with resignation and anxiety
He can no longer drive his car or go to synagogue
He can no longer be with his "Minyan- Aires"
His beloved cronies who prayed together morning and evening
Year after year, an uncluttered slice of time
The quorum of 10 men, the band of prayer brothers
Who prayed, free of existential distractions…immersed
The shul family, their blessings ripple
From person to person, a holy osmosis
Of prayer in unison, feeling the unconditional embrace
Of a loving God, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent,
"After he dismissed them, he went up on a mountainside
By himself to pray." (Mathew 14:23)

Do you know how to get into heaven?

The brochure he offers has Messiah written large with a Star of David underneath
Jews for Jesus I guess
I have a religion thank you
I don't need another one, I say

He is still there when
I leave the coffee shop

Do you think you have to be good to get into heaven?

I hesitate recalling my dad who, to my mother's chagrin had heated arguments with Jehovah's Witnesses who came to the door

I say nothing but take a brochure and head home
I suppose he thinks that's a victory

Here Is The CBC News...

SAM HOFFER

Listening to the radio was for us no casual matter. My parents and older brothers were survivors of the Holocaust, newly arrived in the early 1950's in a Jewish farming colony in southern Saskatchewan. Despite the challenges of a strange, new language, the radio and more particularly the CBC, provided them with a window to our new homeland and an occasional link to the world they had left behind. For me, a young boy of about 10, it was the gateway to a kaleidoscope of life and events I could hardly imagine. Here are three childhood memories of newscasts, of that time, that shaped the world.

The Rosenbergs (1953)

Every hour, life comes to a halt. We listen to the news, our eyes fixed on the radio.

"What are they saying?" my mother asks. My father, anguished, waits for an answer.

"Nothing. It's all up to the president," Joe replies, the strain evident in his voice.

More bulletins. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg are being prepared for execution. Husband and wife. Found guilty of giving the Russians secrets to the bomb.

"Is it possible? Why kill them even if they did these things," I wonder but don't dare to ask.

"They have to blame somebody, so they're blaming the Jews. Nothing has changed," my father declares.

My brother's last hope is written on his face. "It can't happen in America," he says.

It's erev Shabbos.

The radio crackles. There will be no pardon. Not even a delay.

Hours later, the announcer reports that they are dead.

Death enters our house. Disbelief. Fear. Silence.

Outside, I catch the sun nearing the horizon.

Miles above, a vapour trail led by a silver speck, traces across the sky. Another military plane protecting us from the Russians.

They say that we are safer now.

The Rosenbergs are dead.

Sinai War (1956)

The threat of war is heavy in the air. Shooting across the border. Israeli soldiers, the victims of snipers.

I recognize his voice on the radio. Nasser, the president of Egypt, threatening Israel's destruction.

Fear is in my parents' voices. Another war. Lives in danger once again. Our family is there.

I sense my brothers' frustration. Too far to join the coming fight.

What will happen? To Israel? To us?

In the morning we hear the news. War. Millions aligned against us. Reports of death. Tanks and planes. Speeches. A tidal wave of hate.

"Bring us your atlas," they ask. The one I just got. Thick black arrows carved across the Sinai. I stare at the scars. My atlas. A casualty of war.

Sputnik (1957)

"Here is the six o'clock news. History was made today when the Soviet Union launched the first satellite ever to orbit the earth. The satellite entered an orbit at ..."

Joe and I are in the living room. He looks serious, staring at the radio, but says nothing.

My mother asks him to shut it off. It's almost Shabbos.

She blesses the candles and asks us to come to the table. My father rises to recite the Kiddush. He drinks from the cup of wine and blesses the challah. We savour my mother's Shabbos meal.

"I heard them talking a whole day on the radio about the satellite," my mother says, knowing that the subject is still on Joe's mind. "but I don't really understand. What exactly did they do?"

Joe explains. "The Russians shot a rocket far up into the sky and instead of falling back down, it's going to stay up, go around the earth and send radio signals back."

> Listening to the radio was for us no casual matter.

"And what about the Americans?" she asks.

"That's the point. They haven't done it yet. The Russians are first and who knows if the Americans will ever catch up? No one knows where this will lead. They might even get to the moon."

"It's all made up," my father says, breaking his silence. "They aren't going around the earth. They're not going anywhere. Not to the moon. Nowhere."

"Dad," Joe replies, "they will go to the moon. It's only a matter of time."

"Nowhere! They tried it with the Tower of Babel and we know how that ended. If God had wanted us to be on the moon he would have put us there. It's all propaganda – the Russians and the Americans are trying to outdo each other and all the fools are believing it."

I look from one to the other and at the clock. Time for the news, an update on what's happening. "Could it all be fake?" I wonder, "are the Russians just scaring us?"

I glance at the radio. It's off. It's Shabbos. ■

Miracle

MUGUETTE MYERS

Maman was in Paris working for a friend, who like her had escaped the roundup of July 16, 1942. She was there one day in her friend's apartment on the third floor, sewing and minding their little four-year-old boy, as her friend had to go out on some errands.

It was early afternoon when the dreaded knock came to the door. Everyone was well acquainted with the sound of a fist striking wood. And everyone knew what that sound meant.

Before whoever it was broke the door down, Maman opened it. Standing there were two burly French policemen, who had come to arrest the family whose home it was. Going from room to room finding no one, and probably not wanting to get back empty-handed to their headquarters, they arrested Maman after having examined her identity card.

The little four year old started crying: "Pourquoi vous emmenez ma Bella? Elle ne vous a rien fait!" (Why are you taking my Bella? She didn't do anything to you!) Maman tried to argue with them: "Vous n'avez pas honte de faire un métier pareil?" (Aren't you ashamed of what you are doing?) "Will it make a difference if one more Jew will be taken? I have a family. How will you be able to sleep at night?" One policeman looked embarrassed while the other's face registered no emotion. While the second one had his back turned, the first one whispered to Maman: "If only I was alone!"

They started down the stairs. At that time, there was no light in the corridors and there were sandbags on every landing put there in case of bombings, to extinguish fires. Maman was sandwiched between the two policemen, the good one in front and the other one in the back of her. The first one kept saying: "Il fait noir ici, on pourrait se perdre!" (My, it's dark in here! One could get lost!) As he was walking first, he lost his balance on a sandbag. Maman (always the lady, even in the worse of circumstances) helped him up and started brushing him. He repeated once more: "My, it's dark in here!" and as he said so he gave Maman such a mighty shove that she almost fell. Then she understood!. She sat herself on the banister – as we used to do when we were kids – and she let herself slide all the way down to the main floor. From there she heard the policemen stumbling down the stairs. She ran out of the building and straight home. Although her address was listed on her papers the police never came to the apartment.

What If

HELGA STUMMER

Ahasverus' harem had not been replenished,
After Queen Vashti he had banished.

IF Esther's beauty had not pleased the king,
And with another he would have had his fling.

IF his word had not held sway,
And Haman would have had his way.

IF Haman's plot had not boomeranged, and Mordechai would have been hanged.

Then Purim would be full of sadness,
Instead of nachas, joy and gladness.
There'd be no megillah, no gragger,
and no hamantach,
Nothing to read or rattle and nothing to nosh.

That polished pebble that I hold so tightly in my hand has its place in nature.
It becomes a marker to show my generation that I visited, that I honoured someone. who lies here in the vast field of final resting places, amidst other markers that people have left to show their generation that they visited, that they honoured someone.
I lovingly place the pebble atop the nightshadow-grey granite then slowly back away to read the inscription – a brief summary that tells who you were, what kind of person you were – chiseled into the cold stone face to stand the test of time. . .
like that pebble that is a marker to show my generation that I visited, that I honoured and that I loved someone.

Bar Mitzvah in Israel

GAIL BERMAN

The excitement commenced one beautiful spring day, when the family boarded an El Al flight to Israel last May.

There were the grandparents, parents,
two boys and a girl.
One of the boy's was the bar mitzvah boy,
with much wisdom just like a pearl.

While the airplane was swiftly
traversing the sky,
Daniel, the bar mitzvah boy, was reviewing his parshah, to ensure that he knew it dry.

When the family arrived in Jerusalem, they were met by their cousins, all joyous.
Everyone went to the cousins' home, and along the way, passed by the famous Dome.

Following some days of touring,
the family completed preparations.
Because on that coming Shabbat,
the special event would occur.

Indeed, Saturday arrived, sunny and warm, and the Silverman family prepared to go to shul.
They met with their rabbi and cantor, and did the necessary, according to rule.

The Shabbat morning service began,
and the prayers ran their course.
Then came the anticipated moment, when Daniel approached the bimah with his parents.

He chanted his parshah and Haftarah very well.
The congregation sat still, as though under a spell.

The bar mitzvah boy, all the while,
was thinking, how fortunate he was,
to be celebrating his occasion in Israel.

This was worth the lengthy flight, that covered many a mile!

WHERE QUALITY AND CONSISTENCY MAKE THE DIFFERENCE

Who Would Have Ever Thought?

LYNN SAND

The signs were there
But we didn't see
We didn't listen
We didn't believe
It didn't seem possible
Were we deaf, dumb, and blind?
Where was God through all this?
How could He let this happen?
Did He disappear?
Our hearts were heavy and full of trepidation
Was this a nightmare that wouldn't end? There was no day – there was no night
Everything seemed dismal, grey, and unwelcoming
I needed to remember the beauty of spring. The flowers, the butterflies, the birds that would sing
I needed to digress to survive and dream...We were packed like sardines without ventilation
We travelled for days without water, without food, without toilets
We couldn't breathe – many perished before we arrived
The train stopped
People were talking
We didn't know where we were Vicious dogs and brutal masters faced us – ready to attack
With whips and harsh spotlights blinding us
Screaming,
"Men on one side, women and children on the other."
The elderly and sick were sent to gas chambers
All remnants of human dignity were stripped forever
We were unrecognizable
Living skeletons wandered around—insane with hunger
What would become of us?
We prayed to be saved
Some prayed to die
Who would save us?
Why couldn't anyone stop Hitler?
How could anyone get away with such atrocities?
No one could save us but ourselves
Many tried to – but their lives were on the line, too
We had to be tough to endure
We had to keep breathing
Doing things we never thought we could do
But thank God, many of us survived
And lived to tell the story Please God, "Never Again!"

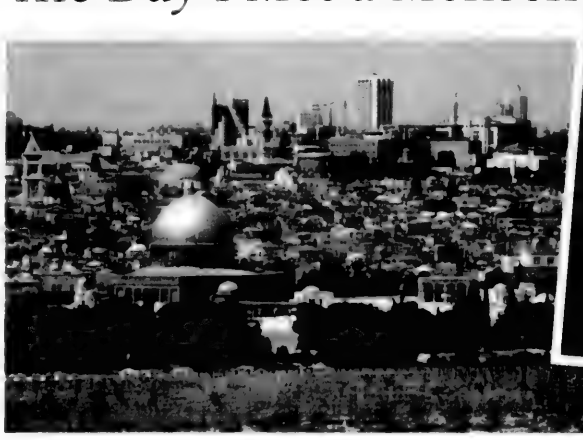
The Day I Met a Mensch



SALLY-ANN KERMAN

I began visiting Israel in 1980 when my daughter planned to move to there to be with her fiancée. I was a little apprehensive because I do not speak Hebrew but I was assured that a great many people speak English and besides I would probably always be with family members who could rescue me when it came to the language issue. I was anxious to see the country and became very excited every time I embarked on a visit there.

Then, one year I became very brave and ventured forth on travels by myself. My daughter assured me that when I left the train station in Jerusalem, it would be easy to find a taxi to take me to the hotel she had suggested I stay in. The hotel was not that far from the train station and it was on the main street, in the midst of all the great shopping stores.

It was a lovely sunny day when my daughter waved to me after she had put me on the train in Binyamina on my way to Jerusalem. The ride was spectacular, especially as one approaches the hills surrounding Jerusalem. It was spring and the wild flowers were abundant.

They seemed to decorate the entire view and I was thrilled watching them, especially since I knew there were only cold, snow and ice storms back home in Canada. Finally, I arrived at the train station in Jerusalem and asked about the hotel I was going to.

The kind gentleman I asked spoke no English but he scurried about and found someone who did. The young man assured me that although it was very hot, I would have no trouble walking the short distance to the hotel.

I started on my way. It was 35 degrees out. My luggage, which I thought was very light suddenly, became very heavy as I trudged along. I kept watching for the hotel but did not see it. Finally, when I was at the end of my strength and was thirsty, tired, grubby and generally thinking it was not such a good idea to go to Jerusalem, I suddenly I spotted a Jerusalem Tourism Office and I literally flopped in on one of the seats there. A kind old man came over, brought me a cold drink and asked me if I was lost. I told him I think I am lost and I am exhausted and sorry I ventured out to this terrible city.

Well, that was a personal affront for him. It is a beautiful city and you have come at an important time, he informed me. We are celebrating the return of Jerusalem to our people for 20 years. Yes, it was 1987 and the city was busy with the planned visit of many tourists.

I was not very impressed but the love and pride in the face and voice of this old man began to penetrate. Suddenly, after I had rested a while, this kind old man took me by the hand and escorted me to the hotel. He left me his card and asked me to enjoy my visit to Jerusalem. I shoved his card in my pocket, thanked him for his kindness and entered the hotel where I went up to my room, refreshed myself and lay down on the bed.

I didn't wake up until dark and I went downstairs to the front desk where I was told the best place to get something to eat. I did have an exciting and fruitful time for the next few days and returned to my daughter's house with nothing but wonderful stories and all my shopping "buys." She asked me who the nice old man was who helped me that first day and I fished around in my pockets until I found his card. My daughter collects business cards from people that impress her.

Neither my daughter or son-in-law could believe my ignorance when I showed them the business card of that wonderful man who was so kind to me and taught me the history of the city that meant the world to him. They were still laughing and chiding me for not knowing who he was. They finally told me it was no other than Teddy Kollek, the mayor of Jerusalem.

I wasn't as impressed with his title as much as of the man himself and the love and pride that oozed from his very pores when he spoke of Jerusalem. My title for him was simply Mensch. There are probably many attempts at translating the word "mensch" and you can try, if you like. Let me know what you come up with. You will likely have many people describe someone that fits that description, but I have never met anyone as true to the meaning and feeling of the word "Mensch" as Teddy Kollek. (Well, maybe my Zaidie, but that's another story). ■

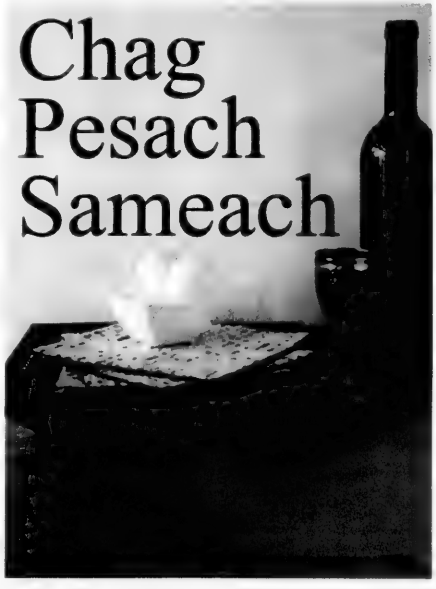
Chag Pesach Sameach



Rebirth : After the Holocaust

JUDY WEINRYB

I see the world through filtered lenses in grainy textures and subdued tones
An endless prism of light and darkness

Haunting memories of my parents' suffering
like blotches of paint, formed sinister clouds
on the innocent canvas of my very young life

As an infant, my cries were gently calmed by my mother's lilting lullabies,
her sorrows hidden,
far beyond my grasp.

I held on tightly to my parents'
outreached hands,
warm and nurturing to the touch.
I could not see their broken hearts

The uninvited presence of hurtful recollections was not enough to quell their boundless love

Healing slowly over time, the love we shared was a soothing balm

My parents learned to live again
but never forgot their painful past.

I See Her Again

BRIAN OSTROVSKY

Yes! I see her again
As the winter's day turns into early night
Whilst her Shabbos candles glow
With their sacred light

When the sun steadily sinks into the deep
Through the drapes she peeps
Alone in her corner, Abandoned.

Overcome by a burning thirst
To feel her first
Thrill of exaltation,
She stands open-eyed
Peering outside,

Praying for that passerby
Who would care
To join her, to share
In blessing the challah and the wine
And together they would entreat the Divine:
"Hakadosh Borechu, please, do usher in Your splendour
To allow its blessed blissfulness to percolate
Into our neshamahs and radiate our dwelling
This Shabbos evening."

Two Days in the Jewish Heart of Athens, Greece

RUTH R. FRANKEL-GRANER

Greece was calling. I had no idea why. It's true that in the Canadian school system where I was educated, the study of Greek myths occupied many hours of classroom time. Who hasn't heard of Zeus or Midas, Pandora or Jason? And in university I majored in classical Greek art and architecture. But apart from occasionally (very occasionally,) distinguishing a Doric column from an Ionian, I don't think that I had given Greece a second thought for almost 40 years. Why was it calling now, especially now when as an adult student of Judaism I have been left wondering why there had ever been any emphasis on exposing young minds to the malevolent nature of the ancient Greek gods and goddesses – omnipotent beings who tampered with the lives of humans, inflicting punishments in perpetuity.

So why would I even contemplate a journey to Greece? Well, there are the incomparable Greek bequests to western culture and civilization, philosophy, medicine, art, architecture and the thousands of words in the English language from alpha to zenith. Was that why Greece was calling?

But how could I go there? Time spent in most European countries leaves me sleepless and haunted. While I have strolled Paris in April, scrambled to the top of a still-smoking Mount Vesuvius, fulfilled a childhood dream of munching red-waxed Edam in Holland, prowled through an endless castle in Madrid (400 rooms and still counting), even sailed past the Globe Theatre on the Thames River, I have also photographed the solitary statue of Maimonides in Cordoba, Spain, a country where following the Expulsion centuries ago, few Jews live, and most if not all synagogues are no more than tourist sites. I have also trudged up the hill at York, England to Clifford's Tower, the scene in 1190 of the mass- suicide of doomed and desperate Jewish men, women and children. I have gazed in anguish out the same window as Anne Frank in Amsterdam, shuddered at the synagogue in Paris with its inconspicuous plaque and reference to "the Nazi barbarians." Each European visit was darkened by the questions: Is this where it happened? On this corner? This field? This stadium? Was she responsible? Or he? But Greece was calling. And finally, I answered.

I bought a plane ticket, booked a bus tour. Even my fortune cookie said "Pack your bags. You're bound for an exciting destination!" I began my research. I contacted Chabad and I emailed the Jewish Museum of Greece in Athens. Could they help me find a guide for the Jewish aspects of that city?

Both provided the same name. The website greecetravel.com/ Jewish history/, condensed to about 25 pages the story of the Greek Jews, a tale probably beginning before the destruction of the Second Temple.

Painting by Ruth R. Frankel-Graner

Life in Greece was never without peril. As in the rest of Europe there were unprovoked tragedies: pogroms, murders, robberies, threats, humiliations, persecutions. And then in the 20th century came the horrifying events when an estimated 90 per cent of Greek Jews perished under the Nazi onslaught.

Now, of perhaps 10,000 Jews surviving after the war, about 5,000 are left today, most in Athens. And so I arrive in that city with a little knowledge and arrangements for my guide to meet me in the lobby of my hotel. I did not expect these few days to colour everything I would experience in Greece in the weeks to follow, but that is what happened. I am writing what I recall, hoping that inaccuracies will be few, realizing that when I look back, much that I record will be through the filter of translation, time and emotion.

As we drive to the two synagogues still in use in the city, my guide narrates the story of the Greek Jews. We will, at my request, visit the cemetery in Athens –something I feel I must do – but, he suggests, at the end of our journey. The Jewish school and youth centre are closed today and tomorrow. He points out the districts where Jewish life once thrived.

In one area, only the name "Jerusalem Market" remains. I'm sure I see anti-Semitic graffiti on a door. When I return home, I learn that less than a week later, a Greek singer had been threatened in a nightclub for answering a request from visiting Israeli businessmen. Later she was criticized in the media.

In Athens, two synagogues on Melidoni face each other. On the road, a locked iron gate blocks cars. Behind it, in a glass-windowed booth, an armed police guard watches. A large black dog stands outside.

Jewish museum in Greece FILE PHOTOS

The earlier synagogue, Etz Hayim (1904-1906) is Romaniot in style,in the tradition of the earliest Greek Jews. The later building, Beth Shalom,(1930s) is Greek Revival and Sephardi. The older has been quietly refurbished with muted Persian carpets and a contemporary stained glass mural in angular shapes casting a bright rainbow of colours on one wall of the sanctuary. The synagogue is empty, but the presence of the hundreds of people who have passed here before is palpable – the sounds of singing and wailing, joy and even terror pulsate in the air around us. Nothing else from its earliest beginnings remains. A full minyan, my guide tells me, at either shul, even on Shabbat, does not always happen. Weddings, bar mitzvahs, special occasions-yes.

The wooden front door of Beth Shalom must be 40 feet high. Behind its marble façade are gleaming marble floors in a diamond pattern that flow to a courtyard, serene and silent.

In the courtyard of one of these synagogues, a lavabo, with the carved head of a lion in the centre of its farthest wall, looks out past us. The red-tiled roof is outlined by the black grillwork of wrought iron hooks.

It was to this courtyard that the Nazis summoned Jewish Athenian men on the pretext that their imprisoned friends and relatives would be released if they appeared. Some of the men, realizing what was going to happen, leaped over the wall. My guide's grandfather was trapped, and although he was able to send a few notes from a concentration camp in Chaidari, he was never seen again, but he had prepared his wife and collected some money. He had warned her that if he was not back very soon, she was to leave with the four children.

A Christian family hid them, and the Chief of Police of Athens, Angelos Evert, now honoured in Yad Vashem, helped alter their passports by substituting Greek first names for their own. My guide's father survived because of the courage and conscience of a few people. Today, his son is my escort.

Our next stop is the Jewish Museum of Greece in Athens, pleated among other buildings into a corner of frantic Nikis Street, turbulent with motorcycles, narrow cars and hordes of people. The black scrolled, wooden door is 1 1/2 stories high. When it closes on the clamour of the city, the only sound heard is my intake of breath. Burnished wooden floors stream beside sparkling pale marble ones. Honey-hued columns spiral around golden light from a skylight above a central octagonal atrium radiating to nine levels of wonder. But the museum also has uniformed security. Here, my guide's wife will lead me through meticulous displays of Jewish history, ceremonial objects, and yes, the sublime aquamarine and gold Torah case.

Some displays show the intermingling of Greek and Jewish customs. An entire floor is devoted to the tragic story of the Greek Jews during the Holocaust. But rooms are set aside for inter-faith meetings of children, teaching Jewish Greek heritage, as well as Holocaust education here, and in Greek schools. The museum looks to the past and the future.

Later in the week, when I visit the National Museum of Archaology in Athens with its sumptuous statuary and golden relics, I feel the absence of significant social commentary. What are the ideas represented in the immense presence of the statue of Zeus-arms extended almost to the walls-except raw power?

In the days that follow, the lofty temples of the ancient Greeks are diminished. I know at what human cost they were created. When we pass the canal at Corinth our guide does not inform us that Jewish prisoners hacked into the earth, that in fact most of the Grecian splendours were at the cost of slave labour.

The acropolis is suspended like a permanent white cloud above the city of Athens, an omniscient presence, high above the squat earthquake-resistant apartment buildings. Below it glows a little treasure - the Jewish Museum.

I think when Greece was calling,this is what it meant to say:

Somewhere in an ancient land, an ancient people do what they have always done, picked up the splendid pieces of their inheritance and forged ahead.

Surely what I heard when Greece called was the sound of the human spirit. ■

The World has Gone Mad

SUZANNE REISLER LITWIN

Has it?
Perhaps some of it
Thank God, not all of it

When incomprehensible hate
Happens someplace, somewhere
Each day

Someone has gone mad.

When it's so easy to be Free, kind and peaceful
Live by 10 ancient laws

What's gone wrong?

Is there a void of love?
Lack of contact, commitment, contentment
Missing relevant involvement?

Seriously, what's gone wrong?

In these twisted minds
Madness has set in, then out
Have mothers stopped loving their children?

This world is my home
Your home
The only truth home we share

Rebirth oneself into his arms
Allow the good to penetrate your soul
Believe, truly believe...in Only then can we Heal the world

One word at a time

JOYCE WIHL

Yesterday we were boys, and this was my friend. Today he is accused of a bad word I hardly ever heard of. Today he is "Jew". My shame hurts us both.

Yesterday these streets were ours. Today these streets, these people are foreign. Did our silly imaginations invent their guns and uniforms? Can our wishing make them go away?

A mysterious horror is throbbing inside me. I am already tired of questions and fear. And I am afraid.

Yesterday we were boys, and this was my friend. Yesterday is further away than death.

The Sukkah

LARRY FINKELMAN

Under the crisp blue October sky, wedged between two brick buildings built in the middle of the last century and meant to last well into the next, stood the Sukkah made of wood.
The lattice walls allowed the wind, small gaps in the roof slats admitted the rain, and uneven gravelly ground permitted the cold.
It wanted to be temporary.
It welcomed its guests with a knowing smile, taking them onto its lap and holding them safe.
Like some old scholar bent over books, it wanted to teach us something about fragility and faith and living under God's protection.

Twilight

ANNE DUCHOWNY

As I approach the twilight of my dwindling years
I conjure up like a magician memories laying dormant in the labyrinth of my mind,
I pull them out reluctantly, some better left behind.
Happy thoughts, sad thoughts, memories of many fears.
Some still evoke a smile, some reduce me to tears.
A name recalled, a face appears virtually forgotten through the journey of my years.
Dreamlike visions of people and places ricocheting by dredged up from the recesses of the deepest caverns some sharp, some nebulous in my mind's eye.
Regrets, of course for deeds and words,
some done or not,
some said or left unsaid because I did not dare, but with each passing year the burden of omission and commission becomes much easier to bear.
For each diminished faculty I mourn amputated, abandoned, never to be reborn.
But oh! the beauty and the wonder of it all,
And so until I get that final call whatever has been scripted and prescribed
I will play out until the end as was devised.

Just as Sweet

RACHELLE LERNER

Proust is right: we reach back to the past through our senses

I am just recovering from one of those splendid gifts that Canadian winter presents us all with – a cold and chest infection – and I finally realized why I, a vegetarian of more than two decades, always crave chicken soup whenever I am laid low. Never mind the cliché that it is Jewish penicillin. It comforts me because my bubbie, who was tender and brusque, always smelled of chicken soup. Whenever we visited, the first thing that she did was to lean over and kiss me, and I remember the softness of her crumpled skin and its perfume – the chicken soup that was invariably simmering away on the stove. Oh, and that large purse that she always carried, a beige, platinum leather, rectangular purse with a metal clasp that she snapped opened to give us the treasures housed within: chocolate bars, Turkish delight, and a mauve gum long since no longer manufactured.

The recent death of my uncle that leaves only my one aunt and my dad, the two youngest in the family, has stirred up memories, not least because at the shivah house, we looked at black-and-white wedding photos of my aunt and uncle. My dad had no recollection of having worn a top hat – yet, there was the proof. Later, my dad and I watched the films that he had shot of a succession of seders during my childhood.

I still feel the heat of those light bulbs used with that Super 8 camera. One of the funniest moments was seeing my short, but sturdy bubbie reach across the dining room table to seize the wine glasses from the clutches of two of my cousins who liked to get as drunk as they could on the kosher wine.

Just to show how enduring memories can be, I do remember my dad turning the camera on my mom and her telling him to stop, which, tease that he is, only encouraged him to persist, as I do of one of my uncle's long goodbye (for he had gotten loaded).

There is also a trace of a memory of playing circle games with my bubbie and my cousins. And the mere thought of my bubbie's searing horseradish, as, too, my mom's, makes my eyes well up and my nose flare from the fumes. My dad recounted that when he was a child, my bubbie took in boarders to supplement the meager earnings that my zaidie made as a chicken salesman, and one boarder learned the hard way just how lethal my bubbie's horseradish was. When she encouraged him to try some, he eagerly helped himself to a heaping soup spoon's worth that made him start a dance frantically all through the kitchen that became even more frenzied after he tried to douse the heat with water.

Watching the films and seeing how young and vibrant my mom was reminded me of why Passover is such a bittersweet holiday for me. A week before Passover in 1995 and right before her birthday, my mom died at the age of sixty-three. Numb and in shock, I got up from sitting shivah, and had to go to the grocery store to buy all the food that we needed for that holiday. No matter how drained that I felt, I still had to go on with the cleaning and the cooking, in part for my then young sons and my husband, and in part to honour my mom and my bubbie, who both expressed their love through food.

Since then, each time that I take out the white linen and cotton tablecloth and serviettes that my mom bought for me, light the candles in the silver Shabbat candleholders that my bubbie brought over from Poland, and place the matzah in her embroidered silk tasseled holder, I think of them.

The symbolic foods for each holiday endow the festivities with a vivid continuity through their tastes, shapes, and smells. So do the memories of the foods that my bubbie and my mom prepared. On one visit to my bubbie – who spoke only Yiddish – told me to take a little taste.

I asked her what I had just eaten and she said: "cowfleish."

My dad then translated: "beef tongue." Horrified, all that I could visualize was this gigantic tongue masticating. Perhaps, though, it was the very early memory of my bubbie cleaning a chicken that started me on the road to becoming a vegetarian. Nonetheless, I did eagerly ingest her tomato flavoured fricassee, including the chicken feet that then you could buy, even though I felt slightly squeamish.

My mom was an expert baker, who excelled in creating all kinds of elaborate floral decorated cakes. She always baked the birthday cakes for our sons. The first one was a large teddy bear cake and three little alphabet block cakes. The second production was a yellow big bird cake, with blue Cookie Monster cookies to hand out as party favours (which turned the children's mouths blue.) In her last year of baking, she made a huge hockey rink cake, complete with hockey players intricately shaped out of blue and white, and red and white royal icing. So, after my mom died, I wanted to carry on the tradition and told my younger son that I would bake a hockey rink cake for his birthday. I laboured for hours. By his bedtime, he was in tears because it just did not look as good as Bubbie's cakes had been. But, I redoubled my efforts and, by the next day, my family pronounced it outstanding.

My bubbie and my mom were both strong willed individuals. While my bubbie was Orthodox, my mom maintained that you can worship anywhere and that it is your daily actions that manifest your spirituality. Still, with her characteristic enthusiasm for any new project, my mom threw herself into making an Orthodox home after she had converted, endeavours that my dad, rebel as he was, asked her to tone down. We did observe all of the Jewish holidays, and regularly attended Friday night dinners at my Bubbie and Zaidie. But, my parents also encouraged my siblings and me to learn about other religions, too.

Nevertheless, they did draw a line when we moved into the suburbs and I started attending elementary school. In those days, each school day began with singing God save the Queen, reciting the Lord's Prayer, followed by an hour of religious instruction. Soon after I started school, I came home to ask who this "Jesus Christ" was. Alarmed, my parents met with the school principal the very next day, as did the parents of the only two other Jewish students at the school. The upshot was that we three were excused from reciting the prayer and the religious class. However, instead of allowing us to go to the library, we were told to sit outside in the hallway – as if we were the great unwashed. Needless to say, we began to be ostracized. It was an early lesson in the need for religious tolerance.

My parents also wanted me to get a Jewish education. When I was eight years old, they enrolled me in a part-time Hebrew school that I attended Monday through Thursday after my regular school day and Sunday mornings. It was a classroom filled with some 80 boisterous students, who loved to toss food and books around. I was meek and well behaved, hence the report cards that I received were filled with A+s.

Unfortunately, all that I actually managed to learn over the next three years was the Hebrew alphabet and to parrot some Hebrew songs. Rather, I learned from my parents' teachings and from reading the English translation of the Torah. (I was shocked to learn when I took a mythology and religious studies course at university that the Old Testament has more than five books and are in a different order.) The only other memory I have is of the miserable car ride to and from the classes. The car windows were always shut tight, which made the air noxious, because the driver smoked cigarettes incessantly and one of the other children always brought two oranges to peel and eat. To this day, the smell of either makes me ill.

There is one more lingering smell from my childhood that is also a phantom one everywhere, except in my memory. Whenever I look at two photos of my dad and me, taken when I was a toddler, I recollect standing in the dispensary of the pharmacy where my dad had worked – way back in what was called New Toronto. In the second photo, I am perched on a tall white stool. I flashback to watching my dad prepare a medication using a mortar and a pestle and my nose wriggles at that peculiar drugstore smell long since vanished. None of the chain drugstores have that distinctive blend of chemical and sweetish odours. Since then, only once have I encountered that smell in – of all places – a cluttered pharmacy in Niagara Falls.

It is not quite Proust's madeleine, but it is perhaps closest to what Gertrude Stein meant with her echo of Shakespeare: "A rose is a rose is a rose." It smells just as sweet as the memories of childhood. ■

Nenshi buys bread, and Noah learns a lesson about Twitter

Chametz fit for a mayor

In what's believed to be a first for a Canadian mayor, Calgary's Naheed Nenshi bought the chametz from members of a shul in his city. Rabbi Shaul Osadchey of Beth Tzedec Congregation approached the country's first big-city Muslim mayor with the idea at a recent interfaith event, the Calgary Herald reported. About 40 families in the 600-member Conservative synagogue had sold their chametz by March 30. The rabbi said the aim was to get more of them to take part than the 20 who normally do so annually. The chubby-cheeked Nenshi joked he was disappointed he wouldn't get to take possession of the food. "I was hoping to fill the entire office with bread and pasta."

Calgary Mayor Naheed Nenshi

Comic's tweets haunt him

Two Jewish groups expressed concerns over tweets about Jews and Israel by Trevor Noah, 31, the South African comic chosen to succeed Jon Stewart as host of The Daily Show. The Anti-Defamation League and B'nai Brith both urged Noah to avoid making distasteful jokes with Jewish stereotypes on the show. After being named host March 30 by Comedy Central, Noah came under fire for past tweets about women, Jews, and Israel, including one from 2010 that read "South Africans know how to recycle like Israel knows how to be peaceful." Comedy Central said it was unfair to judge Noah based on a few jokes, and Noah himself tweeted: "To reduce my views to a handful of jokes that didn't land is not a true reflection of my character, nor my evolution as a comedian."

Anne Frank died earlier than thought

Anne Frank died of typhus in Bergen-Belsen earlier than previously believed, say researchers who looked into the last months of the teenage diarist and her sister and concluded they died some time in February 1945, not March 1945. The Anne Frank House in Amsterdam made the claim March 31, the 70th anniversary of the official date of the sisters' deaths set by Dutch authorities after the war. The researchers used archives of the Red Cross, the International Tracing Service and the Bergen-Belsen Memorial, as well as eyewitness survivor testimonies. ■

The importance of dialogue

Allow me, with great respect, to react to Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin, who, in his March 26 exchange with Rabbi Lisa Grushcow, ("The value of interfaith dialogue") is skeptical, indeed negative, about interreligious dialogue.

What is the fundamental Jewish objective in Christian-Jewish dialogue? To counteract anti-Semitism. Period. Everything else is secondary, a means to that end.

Dialogue helped bring about the Second Vatican Council, which abolished Catholic teaching and preaching of anti-Semitism.

Dialogue was instrumental in moving the Carmelite convent, with its conspicuous cross, away from Auschwitz.

Dialogue includes Holocaust education. For close to 40 years, we have prevailed on Christian churches, of many denominations, to devote a regular Sunday service to commemorating the Shoah. If I, and Holocaust survivors, were unable to set foot in a church, how would we carry out that education?

Dialogue also allows us to defend the State of Israel. We are not always successful, but no other Canadian church has followed the lead of the United Church [which endorsed a boycott on goods produced in the West Bank].

We had 19-1/2 centuries of anti-Semitism. We have had close to 70 years of dialogue, and at least here in Canada, although anti-Semitism has not completely disappeared, it is no longer the mainstream, pervasive, discriminatory phenomenon it was before World War II. This fall, the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal will be holding a conference to mark the 50th anniversary of the Second Vatican Council. Dialogue is a major asset to the Jewish community.

Tories also aided refugees

The column "Canada failed the Pusama family" by Bernie Farber (March 26) deals with a human tragedy, indeed.

It may well be that government inaction is to blame. Nevertheless, Farber should refrain from contorting that unhappy episode into a political party advertisement.

I have never been a member of any political party. However, I recall, with great pain, successive Liberal governments that practised what Farber now characterizes as "no mercy" and "cruelty" in rejecting, consistently, my pleas, on behalf of Canadian Jewish Congress, to provide temporary sanctuary to specific Jews trapped, along with 4,500 of their fellow co-religionists, in their own country of Syria.

No amount of pleading, in letters and in face-to-face meetings with ministers and government officials, ever resulted in a positive response. All I was able to get were statements that they were "monitoring the situation" in that country, which was a Jewish prison.

Only when there were Conservative governments in office was I able to get minister's permits for Jewish refugees. In addition, ministers such as Ron Atkey and Barbara McDougall went out of their way to assist in the endeavour to free Syrian Jewry.

A recipe for school growth

Contrary to the report, "Jewish high schools struggle with enrolment," (March 26), I am very proud to say that Montreal's Herzliah High School has been experiencing a very real increase in enrolment over the last three years. For this current, as well as for the coming academic year, our classes at all levels are full to capacity.

With this good news though, there are specific directions that Jewish schools should consider to reignite the passion for Jewish education in our community.

First, it is essential to ensure that classroom education is on trend with cutting-edge pedagogic practices. Combined with this, Jewish schools should be accredited by the Canadian Association of Independent Schools. This process requires a deep introspection in pedagogy, governance, financial management, fundraising and more.

Equally important, boards of directors should be constantly seeking ways for schools to demonstrate to the community the value in attending a Jewish high school.

Finally, elementary schools must be advocating to their parents the many benefits of a Jewish high school, as we know that Jewish identity-building and Israel advocacy can best be accomplished in a Jewish secondary school environment.

RABBI·2·RABBI

Partners in our own redemption

Is the lesson of the Exodus that God will do all the heavy lifting for us or that we must show initiative, courage and faith before God will act?

RABBI YAEL SPLANSKY
HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE, TORONTO

RABBI MARK FISHMAN
CONGREGATION BETH TIKVAH, MONTREAL

Rabbi Splansky: Our Sages teach that we should "wear out our lips by saying the word dayeinu," which means "it would have been enough for us" (Leviticus Rabbah 35:12). The most famous example of that effort is the song written more than 1,100 years ago that we sing at the seder. No less than 15 stanzas drive home the point: "If God had brought the plagues upon the Egyptians, but had not given us their wealth, dayeinu!. If God had split the sea for us, but did not bring us through it onto dry land, dayeinu!

Rabbi Fishman: Classically understood, Dayeinu is a chance to keep asking for more while saying thank you But perhaps we could look at the song from a new perspective – maybe the words actually mean what they say.

So underserved were the Hebrew slaves that had God done nothing more for them than take them out of Egypt, it would have sufficed. With each stanza, then, we are left feeling overwhelmed by gratitude to a greater power that keeps going above and beyond.

After a while, however, we realize that the greater the gift, the greater the dependency.

Rabbi Splansky: The 14th-century Spanish commentator Abudarham asks if we really mean what we say when we say dayeinu. Would it really have been enough if God had brought us to Mount Sinai, but not given us the Torah? Would it really have been enough if God had brought us out of Egypt, but not into the land of Israel?

On its surface Dayeinu is a pile-on of gratitude, but underneath may be the implied request for more. We can't help but want more from God's outstretched and open hand. We praise the Creator of the fruit of the vine and we drink deep from the four cups, but our story isn't complete until Eliyahu drinks from his cup, too. Ours is an insatiable desire that human history will yet give way to complete redemption.

Rabbi Fishman: What our Sages are most wary about is an omnipotent God outshining His people and not leaving any room for them. Perhaps, like a rich uncle who keeps spoiling his nephew, our tradition was able to turn around and say "Enough already! You have given us so much, but now let us discover our destiny for ourselves!"

Rabbi Splansky: Similarly, we begin Pesach with the Haggadah's rendition of how we came to freedom by way of God's miracles and wonders. Our sages who constructed the Haggadah wrote Moses out of the narrative. But we end Pesach with the Torah's account that includes Moses, Miriam, and the "mixed multitude" driving toward change.

Rabbinic legend drives home the point that redemption requires human initiative. With Pharaoh's army at our backs and the sea before us, Moses raised his staff, and nothing happened. The sea was unchanged.

Then, a man named Nachshon ben Aminadav stepped into the water while declaring God's power and might. The waters rose to his knees, his hips, his neck, filled his throat. He was all but drowning in his faith when the sea flung open. An ordinary man forced the miracle.

The Yiddish expression, "Be a Nachshon" means "Take initiative." It may also come with theological undertones, as Yiddish expressions often do: to be a Nachshon is to be active in faith that God will act.

Rabbi Fishman: One of the few songs Paul McCartney and John Lennon wrote for Beatles drummer Ringo Starr was With a Little Help from My Friends. I believe that is a fitting title for God's relationship with us.

Yes there can be miracles, but first there needs to be a partner that God can call upon, even rely upon. God would rather a partnership than a dictatorship. God is looking for someone, who can show initiative and courage. God would rather see humanity transcend and overcome human nature than perform acts that defy human nature.

Thus, what begins with God ends with man. In a saga that sets the God of history against the most powerful nation on earth, the true test of freedom is whether we mortals wish to take the plunge.

Perhaps God, too, can sing these lyrics looking for someone to love: "Do you need anybody?/I need somebody to love/Could it be anybody?/I want somebody to love." ■

Guest Column

From disputation to dialogue

RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

This past weekend, as Jews around the world observed Passover, western Christian communities marked Pâques, known in English as Easter. Eastern Christians will celebrate next Sunday.

This timely coincidence should remind us of the history of Jewish-Christian relations and help us realize how much has changed since the 1965 Vatican's Nostre Aetate ("In Our Era," Pope Paul VI's declaration on the relation of the Church to non-Christian religions), which reframed the relationship of the Church with the modern world and re-conceptualized the relationship of the Church to the Jewish People.

Although their spring dates often overlap, in 325 CE, the Church determined that Easter would no longer be dependent on Passover. Tragically, throughout the Middle Ages, European Jews experienced the Christian Holy Week as a time of physical danger and persecution, accusation and assault. In contrast, this season is now a time for Christians to note the Jewish roots and context of Jesus.

Six hundred years ago, the Disputation of Tortosa pitted a team of Jewish scholars against leaders of the Catholic Church. That encounter, and there were many others, sought to compel Jews to accept the arguments of their adversaries. In more recent years, notwithstanding moments of disagreement, the two religions have moved from disputation to dialogue, from conflict to conciliation.

Over the past 50 years, the Church has affirmed the teaching of the Apostle Paul that the divine covenant with the Jewish People is eternal. The Church has condemned anti-Semitism, affirmed that the "spiritual patrimony common to Christians and Jews" should lead to "mutual understanding and respect," accepted the continuity of the living Covenant between God and the Jews, and recognized the existence of the State of Israel as a manifestation of divine blessing for the Jewish People.

A year ago, Pope Francis made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, travelling to the land of the people into which Jesus was born. Already known for personal humility, modesty and a commitment to social justice, this Pope demonstrated remarkable solidarity with the Jewish community in the wake of the 1994 terror attacks in Buenos Aires and was involved in a joint Jewish-Catholic organization called Tzedakah (justice and charity). He has pledged to continue the values articulated in Nostre Aetate.

Last year, I joined with an imam, a priest and a minister to bring Jews, Muslims and Christians to the Holy Land. We travelled the Path of Abraham because Israel is the biblical and national homeland of the Jewish People, the spiritual birthplace of Christianity and the location of Muslim sacred sites. Our faiths are inextricably linked by ties of history, geography and theology. These ideals have been reaffirmed by Cardinal Thomas Collins, Archbishop of Toronto, who has enjoyed a yom tov meal in my sukkah and who treasures a gift from the Toronto Board of Rabbis, A Jewish Commentary to the New Testament.

It would be an important gesture of solidarity for Canadian Catholic religious leaders to travel to Rome and Jerusalem with rabbis and significant lay leaders from the two communities. This would advance the mutual understanding and respect that already exists between our faiths. ■

'No dogs, no Jews': no evidence

Toronto attempted to eliminate Gentiles Only signs like this one in 1932. ONTARIO JEWISH ARCHIVES, BLANKENSTEIN FAMILY HERITAGE CENTRE PHOTO

Ron Csillag

The phrase has burrowed into the Canadian Jewish consciousness. Community leaders, politicians, local history buffs and yes, journalists, almost reflexively deploy the words to illustrate the horrible prejudices Jews encountered in Canada from the 1930s to the '50s.

The oft-cited message, repeats the Canadian Encyclopedia's entry on anti-Semitism, appeared on signs in many places: at public parks and beaches in Toronto, outside resorts and hotels in the Laurentians and Ontario's cottage country, and in the vacation areas of Manitoba and British Columbia.

A few years ago, a Jewish candidate for public office uttered the "no dogs or Jews" meme. As recently as a few weeks ago, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), in a press release, recalled that "signs in public parks went so far as to declare: 'No dogs or Jews allowed.' "

There's a problem, however, and it may shock you: there is no proof that such signs existed. Several top Jewish historians don't recall ever encountering evidence of them in their research, with one acknowledging the signs could be an urban myth.

Pundits often say: "The absence of evidence is not evidence of absence." True. But logic also tells us that given the voluminous files at various archives brimming with photographic and documentary material confirming rampant anti-Semitic attitudes in Canada in that era, wouldn't there be verification of the most insulting example, the sign declaring "No Dogs or Jews"?

There's not one.

The Canadian Jewish Congress national archives in Montreal and the Ontario Jewish Archives, Blankenstein Family Heritage Centre in Toronto hold photos of signs from the era with the following messages: "Christians Only – Jews Not Allowed"; "No Jews Wanted;" "Jews Not Allowed"; and several examples of "Gentiles Only."

They were found in Jackson's Point, Ont.; Forest Hill Lodge near Burleigh Falls, Ont.; the Mossington Park Resort on Lake Simcoe; the Cawthra Mansions Tea Rooms in Toronto; Lakeside Point in Scarborough; Musselman's Lake beach in Ontario; and Pleasant Valley Ranch in Oshawa.

There's one ominous number from the Quebec resort town of Ste. Agathe, north of Montreal, warning Jews to "scram while the going is good." (The French message says the village is French-Canadian, "and we will keep it that way.")

The Jewish Public Library in Montreal also has no record of signs referring to dogs.

The signs were said to be on two Toronto beaches: Sunnyside and Kew. The City of Toronto's online archives produced no evidence, while the response from archivist Liam Peppiatt to an inquiry a few weeks ago was: "I cannot seem to find anything in our database that reflects what you are looking for."

Toronto attempted to eliminate "Gentiles Only" signs starting in 1932, when the Jewish alderman John Judah Glass, chairman of the parks commission, succeeded in forbidding the erection of any signs on city property without commission approval. Ontario's 1944 Racial Discrimination Act banned racist signs and symbols (and would be used to overturn covenants forbidding the sale of land to Jews).

Several years ago, the late Stephen Speisman, the foremost historian of Jewish Toronto, wrote an irate letter to the Toronto Star complaining of an earlier writer's charge that the "No dogs or Jews" signs were myths. Speisman replied: "Although I am not aware of any photograph depicting such signs, there are enough long-time Toronto residents who claim to have seen them to suggest they may have existed," (emphasis added). With due respect to Speisman, that's a lot of waffling.

The writer of the original missive added that in a 1994 letter to him from Pierre Berton, the popular historian had said: "There is no evidence whatsoever – and I looked into this some years ago – that there was ever a sign in Toronto saying 'No dogs or Jews allowed.' "

Gerald Tulchinsky, in Canada's Jews. A People's Journey, noted the "no dogs" signs "allegedly" existed. Historians Lita-Rose Betcherman, Allan Levine and Frank Bialystok (and others) have written that the signs did exist (they were "displayed prominently," said Bialystok) but none provided references or examples.

Ira Robinson, chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, said he could find "no visual evidence of 'No dogs and Jews' on the same sign." Such signs, he added, "may be an urban legend, but it is one solidly based on evident and pervasive anti-Semitic attitudes in both English and French Canada in that era."

Other Jewish academics said they had no knowledge of such signs, or just never researched them.

In their 1987 book The Riot at Christie Pits, Cyril Levitt and William Shaffir depended heavily on research by the late Ben Kayfetz, an expert in the history of Ontario Jewry. Both authors said Kayfetz claimed never to have seen such a sign and that he doubted their existence. There is "no hard evidence" to prove these signs existed, the authors concurred in a footnote.

However, "when challenged, several of our respondents emphatically asserted that they had seen them with their own eyes."

Irving Abella, co-author of None is Too Many, said he had no "personal knowledge" of such signs, though he, too, had met "many people who remember seeing them."

But memories can be notoriously muddy and conflate or combine different events. At resorts, on beaches and in public parks, there were doubtless signs reading "No Dogs" and others with some variation of "no Jews" or "Gentiles only." Over the decades, these two warnings could have morphed into a single declaration. CJC archivist Janice Rosen concurs: "I agree that there were separate signs and that memory fused them."

In no way does the issue of whether such signs existed detract from the virulent anti-Semitism of the era. But it's better to set record straight.

It's time to bring the dogs in. ■

Easily shunned: Canadian Jews behind bars

LAUREN KRAMER
PACIFIC CORRESPONDENT

When Rabbi Zushe Silberstein heard that the Jewish inmate standing before him in a Montreal jail was due to be released in just three days, he didn't hesitate.

"My daughter is getting married this weekend," he said. "I would be honoured if you could attend the wedding."

The prisoner stared at him with unbelieving eyes, certain he had misheard. A rabbi inviting a newly released prisoner to a family wedding? It seemed impossible. But in the next breath, Rabbi Silberstein was offering to help arrange a suit if needed. It was clear his invitation came from the heart.

The conversation between the two men occurred two years ago, and that weekend, the ex-convict did indeed attend the wedding.

"No one knew where he came from, and at the wedding he danced with presidents of synagogues, family and friends, just like anyone else," Rabbi Silberstein recalls. "At one point he approached me, clearly emotional, asking what kind of gift he could give the bride and groom. I told him, 'The gift you'll give will be a promise that never again will you go back to jail.' He gave that gift and he's leading a straight life now."

The encounter was nothing extraordinary for Rabbi Silberstein, who heads Chabad Chabanel in Montreal and regularly visits Jewish inmates in Quebec jails. "We bring them food and sandwiches, we daven, put on tfillin with them and celebrate Jewish holidays with them," he says. There's a seder at Pesach, a Megillah reading on Purim, menorahs on Chanukah and services on Rosh Hashanah.

But it's not just about pushing spirituality, he insists.

"My main thrust has always been to tell these marginalized Jews, 'You're not alone, you're not forgotten. There's someone out there who cares about you.' We're there to comfort, to advise them and to show them the Jewish community cares about them... Chabad is at the forefront of this care, here and everywhere else," Rabbi Silberstein says.

Fifteen years ago, the rabbi founded Maison Belfield as a halfway house for up to six men at a time, offering newly released Jewish inmates shelter, food, clothing, therapy and reintegration assistance.

Correctional Service Canada said as of March 31, 2014 there were 177 offenders who identified themselves as being Jewish. SHUTTERSTOCK PHOTO

Aiding Jewish prisoners is a consuming task and one he takes seriously.

"The [late Chabad] Rebbe [Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson] teaches us not to forget any Jew, no matter where she or he may be," he explains.

"If there's a Jewish person in need, we must care for them. It's why my children and I have more than once travelled 14 hours to help one single Jew in jail. My Shabbos table often has former inmates gathered around it."

Over the 30 years Rabbi Silberstein has been involved with Jewish prison chaplaincy, he's seen all kinds of Jews behind bars, "from a prominent lawyer to children from dysfunctional homes to people with substance abuse issues and those who are highly affluent," he says. "Nobody is immune to falling into this kind of situation."

He refused to disclose the number of Jews presently incarcerated in Montreal, saying only "one is too many" and acknowledging that High Holiday services and Passover seders in the jails see an attendance of up to 10 people.

Correctional Service Canada (CSC) said that as of March 31, 2014, there were 177 offenders who identified themselves as being Jewish, representing 0.8 per cent of the total prison population. That was up from 159 in April 2005.

CSC engages Jewish chaplains who regularly provide religious services, religious education programs and one-on-one counselling with Jewish inmates, said CSC spokesperson Julie O'Brien. "If a Jewish offender has a rabbi, the chaplain will put the two in contact."

Chaplains may approve kosher diets for inmates who require them, a religious dietary policy that was first formalized in 1992. It's a policy Rabbi Silberstein was very much involved in.

"Thirty years ago, the provincial government refused to allow kosher food, and we had to pay $30,000 to provide it to Jewish prisoners," he recalls. "Eventually, under threat that we'd go to the Supreme Court of Canada, the federal and provincial governments eventually provided that kosher food at government expense, after the minister saw that we were serious and would not give up. Today, in Quebec's prison systems, we have excellent co-operation for the needs of Jewish prisoners."

O'Brien says the CSC ensures spiritual accommodation to assist offenders in practising their religion or spirituality as fully as they desire within the correctional setting, up to a level generally available to people in the community. The Jewish community also has representation on the Interfaith Committee on Chaplaincy, an advisory group on religious and spiritual practice for inmates in CSC institutions.

Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services at Jewish Family & Child in Toronto, says that over the past 20 years, he and his team of chaplains have worked with federal, provincial and municipal correctional institutions across Ontario.

Finding plenty in simplicity

Mira Sucharov

When I was in Winnipeg several weeks ago to deliver a talk at the University of Winnipeg, my cousins took me on a stroll on the frozen Assiniboine River.

It was a crisp, sunny day, and we popped into several warming huts along the way that had been installed as part of an international design competition. One in particular caught our eye. Made of galvanized and painted corrugated steel in bright colours embedded in a snow drift, the hut included tubular openings protruding at various angles through which kids were keeping warm by climbing and laughing and sliding.

As we remarked on it, we heard a man quip that the "flying children" part was unintentional. We turned around, and there was Jason Halter, one of the installers of the hut, who had worked with architect Kevin Weiss's Weissbau design team on the project – made by Canada Culvert.

Turns out Jason is a fellow Jewish Winnipegger (I too spent my childhood there), who now lives in Toronto, where he runs a design company – with Anita Matusevics – called Wonder Inc. And while the jungle-gym aspect of the hut may have been unforeseen, there is a great deal of ecological intentionality – even infused with Jewish values, it turns out – behind Halter's own work. As we spoke, I stayed warm in my deep-freeze winter boots, and Jason kept steady on hockey skates, a pair of DJ-style earphones around his neck.

As Jason explained, the warming-hut structure – while itself not actually recycled – gives a nod to his current focus on simple and accessible "adaptive reuse." One of his latest projects is transforming shipping containers into small homes. Jason is passionate about the environmental possibilities of this – he sees it as an innovative way to develop more affordable housing. He calls it "micro architecture." With each container costing roughly $2,500, put four together and you've got an inexpensive, 1,280-square-foot house. Wonder Inc. works with Stor Stac in Toronto to retrofit the container for domestic use by spraying foam insulation, installing drywall and cutting out relevant openings.

Given that shipping containers are meant to withstand the rough, salty waters of an ocean journey, their high-iron-concentrated steel form is well suited to housing. He explained that the containers naturally turn orange with rust, making this form of architecture a contemporary statement about freezing the passage of time.

Jason's personal story is also one about the passage of time. His paternal grandmother, Rhoda Lechtzier-Halter, was the first Jewish girl born in Western Canada, in Winnipeg, in 1881. By the time he was born in 1966, there was an active and well-integrated Jewish community in Winnipeg. He, along with many other Jewish friends, attended University of Winnipeg Collegiate, while playing in Jewish hockey leagues.

Jason describes his work – and his "intensity and creative energy" – as being informed by Jewish values. "Inclusiveness and compassion are what I understand my Jewish roots to be. You always feel like an outsider. The type of work I do is on the fringe."

Jason might see himself as working on the margins, but that fringe is increasingly coming to find the centre. A September 2014 article in The Atlantic about a university professor in Austin, Texas, endeavouring to live in a retrofitted 36-square foot dumpster – replete with home decor items – captured the imagination of many on social media, who helped it go viral.

And visit Vipp's website – the company that's known for its trash bins – and you'll see it marketing its "Vipp Shelters" to urban hipsters who want all the design chic that any architecture magazine peddles.

On one foot (or boot or skate), as the old talmudic saying goes, we didn't get a chance to delve into the entire problem of housing and homelessness. But one could say that this was a good start, helping us enter the Passover season thinking about finding plenty in simplicity. ■

Ideology's captive

Mordechai Ben-Dat

The people of Israel selected their lists of new legislators almost a month ago. Benjamin Netanyahu's list received the most support among Israelis – 25 per cent – entitling his centre-right party to 30 members in the 120-seat Knesset and enabling him to undertake the task of cobbling together a governing coalition.

The president of the United States was clearly unhappy with the results. Ceaselessly, for nearly two weeks after the election he and his officials publicly pilloried Netanyahu whenever possible.

They justifiably criticized the Israeli prime minister for patently expedient, ethnically inappropriate remarks he made prior to the election in an 11th-hour appeal for their vote. But they unjustifiably criticized him for remarks he made that were appropriate, self-evident and truthful concerning the viability of reaching a two-state solution with the Mahmoud Abbas-led Palestinian leadership, especially in light of the current violent, unsettled circumstances in the region. President Barack Obama wilfully distorted the full context of Netanyahu's remarks, ignored his subsequent elaboration upon his original comments and resumed a personal campaign of ostracizing Netanyahu.

Some of our American coreligionists were also very unhappy with the results of the Israeli elections, none more so, it seems, than the political commentator Peter Beinart. He was so angry with "Jewish Israelis" for not voting the way he wanted that he urged Jewish Americans to "punish" the Israeli government for not adopting Obama's peace plan. In a March 19 article in Ha'aretz, Beinart suggested a list of punitive measures that he, like-minded Jewish Americans and the American government can – indeed must – implement until, presumably, Jewish Israelis finally behave the way he knows is best.

"Israelis have made their choice. Now it's time to make ours," Beinart wrote.

It does not seem to bother Beinart that his call to "punish" the lawfully elected government of Israel places him shoulder to shoulder alongside the haters of the Jewish state. He has substituted wishful thinking for reasoned judgment. This is not surprising since the ideology that provides him with the framework for solving Israel's conflict with the Palestinians – American liberalism – and that he unquestioningly embraces does not mesh with the facts-on-the-ground of the region, the irrefutable, harsh reality that he refuses to acknowledge.

The essence of that reality can be glimpsed in the following abbreviated list:

1. At least three times since 2000, Abbas has rejected signing a peace treaty with Israel.

2. Like his predecessor, Yasser Arafat, he cannot concede – among other things –that Israel is the sovereign state of the Jewish People.

3. Like his predecessor, Abbas has repeatedly violated the Oslo accords of 1993.

4. Three times since the summer of 2005, when Israel unilaterally left the Gaza Strip, the Jewish state has been at war with the genocidal, Islamist leaders of Gaza.

5. Abbas has entered into a unity pact with those same Islamist leaders.

6. Time and again, through its incitement against Israel, its collaboration with Israel's rabidly violent enemies and its hostile actions against the Jewish state, the Palestinian Authority (PA) has shown its indifference to trying to win the confidence of a majority of Israelis.

In a real sense, therefore, it was Abbas' PA that effectively "elected" Netanyahu's centre-right, 30-person list.

Beinart ignores this. He is slavishly captive to his ideology. Indeed, the ideology itself seems more important to him than the human beings for whose betterment he claims his ideology stands.

Beinart's repeated pronouncement of love for Israel reminds one of the Peanuts cartoon in which the often-testy Lucy dramatically professes her long-lasting and abiding love for all humanity. Then, noting the doubting look on Charlie Brown's face, Lucy clarifies her bombastic proclamation by stating that "it's just people I can't stand."

At every opportunity, Beinart proclaims his love for Israel. Perhaps, like Lucy, it's simply the Israelis he cannot stand. ■

The State of Israel is a wondrous dream come true

Rabbi Jay Kelman

"When God brought back those who returned to Zion, we were like dreamers."

Who would have, could have, believed that after 1,900 years – and a mere three years after the greatest tragedy in Jewish history – the Jewish People could become sovereign in their land? Throughout most of our exile, Israel was a distant place – physically, spiritually and, perhaps most important, conceptually.

Much of the opposition to Zionism was based on the notion that the mass return of the people to their land was something that had to await the messianic period. Re-establishing a Jewish state was considered otherworldly, the stuff of dreams, something we dare not try to implement in practice. The Holocaust "cured" most Jews of this way of thinking, but for the Jew living the nightmare of Auschwitz, the idea of the State of Israel was inconceivable even as a dream. Its creation would be a miracle as great – and likely greater – than any other in Jewish history. The return to our land, against all odds, allowed the people of Israel to turn the greatest of dreams into reality. As David Ben-Gurion famously remarked, in Israel, believing in miracles is the mark of a realist. The thrice recited prayer "to the city of Jerusalem [please] return in mercy" is being fulfilled before our very eyes.

The world is a much more scary place than it was 10 years ago, or even last year. The Jewish state and the Jewish People (and they are one and the same) are singled out for hatred more than any other. Missiles in the thousands – and perhaps hundreds of thousands – are pointed toward Israel. Yet the Jewish People have never been stronger, and we can and must confidently move forward.

One of the basic characteristics of a dream is the rapid pace at which time moves. While there may be much happening in a dream, the dream itself lasts mere seconds. The State of Israel has been in existence only 67 years. Yet in that historical blink of an eye, Israel has done what others have not accomplished in thousands of years. Torah, technology, science, art, music, innovation, agriculture and medicine – you name it, and Israel is a world leader. For a country with less than .1 per cent of the world's population, this is unbelievable, even for a dream.

The Talmud was greatly interested in the study of dreams, discussing their meaning and significance. Considering the role they play in biblical history, this is not surprising. Long before Freud, our sages surmised that dreams reflect reality – or if not actual reality, then the reality of our wants and desires: "A man is shown in his dreams only what is suggested by his own thoughts" (Brachot 55b). Furthermore, the Talmud teaches that "hakol holech achar hapitaron," all occurs according to the interpretation.

Nowhere is such interpretation more necessary than it is in regard to Israel. Sadly, not all recognize the tremendous gifts that God has blessed us with.

Israel is not a perfect country. It's run by humans, so how could it be otherwise? But it is a more perfect country than most, and perhaps it is more perfect than all. One can look at Israel and see division, challenges, political deadlock, social unrest and enemies all around. Yet one can interpret those as the inevitable growing pains of a young, dynamic, booming country. Should we not all be awestruck by all that Israel has accomplished? The rust of 1,900 years of exile does not come off overnight. Yet so much has been scraped off, revealing amazing beauty beneath.

If we want to see even more beauty, we must properly and positively interpret this most amazing of dreams, so that the greatest of dreams may continue to turn to reality. ■

Celebrating the special moments

Norma Baumel Joseph

I write this column on March 27. You will read it during Passover. I mention these dates because they are significant to me both personally and communally. And I believe that the lessons I take from them are worth sharing.

Fifty years ago, on March 27, 1965, I married Rabbi Howard S. Joseph. Fifty years have passed, 50 years of a faithful, committed and loving relationship. It seems quite strange not only because of the rampant rate of divorce today, but because I am hard-pressed to locate such a long time span. Could it really be so many years?

I recall my father telling me that he could not imagine how he had aged, that in his head he was still a young man though the calendar said he was 85. Now it is my turn to experience that same dislocation. How could time have passed so swiftly that I cannot catch my breath? It has been a wonderful, adventurous life but there have also been many challenges. I never thought I would leave the United States. I never anticipated how much I would grow. I never understood how miraculous long-lasting love is. I never appreciated how much I would learn from my husband. And it all happened so quickly.

Consequently, I value the ability and necessity to celebrate these special moments. Celebrations help to mark the passage of time, to locate our transformations and perseverance. They make the private public, and in doing so, they generate a community of family and friends.

Correspondingly, we need the celebrations of our heritage that take place via holiday cycles.

Passover is the quintessential holiday for this type of experience. Passover marks the transformation of a group of slaves into a nation of free citizens. My marriage ceremony 50 years ago converted two individuals into one new entity; so, too, this holiday marks the creation of a new national unit. Before the Exodus, we were only a series of families. After it, even before Sinai, we became a people, united in history and legacy. We are not united politically or even in all our ritual practices. We are certainly not uniform in opinions. But we do comprise a unit, a known grouping of individuals. And that is celebrated most significantly through this holiday. Passover makes public our unique history and pride in our esteemed heritage.

And of course, it marks the transition of winter into spring (which we really need already). The natural element of our Jewish holidays is also a very important aspect of commemoration and tribute. Remembering who we are is aided by locating our existence within the cycle of the seasons. The ritual of the seder seems to be especially geared to stimulating this mindfulness. Celebrating the design of the seasons and the gifts of new agrarian cycles seems particularly appropriate.

Marking the passage of time through these rituals and ceremonies seems to me to be both ideally Jewish and incredibly necessary. How else can we grasp both our finitude and our eternal survival? The holidays link us to the past of our ancestors and bind us to the future of our inheritors. Celebrations of birthdays and anniversaries do the same. They all help to freeze frame our experiences and punctuate moments in our lives. In some sense, they stop the flow of time while celebrating it.

Finally, it is very important to me that the Passover process takes place in the domestic space. Of all our holidays, this one enables a sense of Jewishness that includes the private space of home with the public recognition of nationhood.

We sanctify ourselves and our history through this process of celebration. The public and private aspects of our lives can thus combine together to mark our own individual and communal existence and purpose. ■

Jewish friends group supports Yezidi cause in Canada

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

It's fair to say that until news agencies started taking the Islamic State (ISIS or ISIL) seriously, few people had heard of the Yezidi people. Or of the Chaldeans, the Assyrians or the Syriac, for that matter.

But as far as Mirza Ismail is concerned, they all share pretty much the same fate: they are non-Muslim minorities – considered infidels – living in Syria and Iraq, facing discrimination, forced conversion, sex slavery, mass rape and even death.

Ismail is an ethnic Yezidi, a member of an ancient people whose tradition states that they have lived in Mesopotamia, the land between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, for more than 6,700 years. They practise one of the world's oldest religions, but they have been oppressed and murdered in large numbers for generations. Ismail said the Yezidis have suffered 74 genocides over the centuries and have seen their number reduced from a high of 23 million to about two million, worldwide, today.

With the rise of the Islamic State, they have seen their ancestral lands occupied, their men slaughtered, their young women and girls made into sex slaves – bought and sold in markets – and their young boys kidnapped and raised to be jihadis.

It's a gruesome fate, one that the wider world has come to learn about as the Islamic State makes no effort to hide the mass executions and rapes that it perpetrates.

Ismail, who lives in the Greater Toronto Area, is looking for help. He's found some with a few Jewish activists who have formed a small support group called Canadian Jews and Friends of Yezidis.

A chance encounter last August led to formation of the group, said Rananah Goldhar, one of its founders. Following a rally at the Israeli Consulate on Bloor Street, some of the participants headed down to Queen's Park, where another rally was being held in support of Christians being persecuted in the Middle East.

They met a group of Yezidis taking part in that protest. Through them, they met Ismail, and soon after, the support group was formed.

"We were shocked when they told us that their women had just been kidnapped and there was a massacre in Iraq of their people," Goldhar said.

"I struggled with getting involved, but finally God answered my question: How can I work and take care of family and volunteer for Israel and be involved with the Yezidi effort? And God answered that you cannot be a Jew without weeping and running to help the Yezidis," she said.

Canadian Jews and Friends of Yezidis is sponsoring a speaking engagement by Ismail titled "Yezidis speak," on April 12 at 7:30 p.m. at the B'nai Brith building at 15 Hove St.

It has also posted a petition online, calling for Parliament to "provide military air cover and equipment to help the Yezidis stranded on Mount Sinjar [in Iraq]; bring to Canada as refugees some of the Yezidis who have been captured, raped, enslaved, and others who have survived their loved ones being killed; rescue women and children who were captured and enslaved by ISIS."

Mirza Ismail

Ismail, chair of Yezidi Human Rights Organization-International, was in Ottawa recently, where he made a pitch for increased Canadian aid for Yezidi refugees.

Just before that, he was in New York to meet officials of the United Nations, to press the Yezidi case for support.

The Canadian government can help with more humanitarian aid, by bringing refugees to Canada and by supplying arms to Yezidi fighters who are outgunned when facing heavily armed Islamic State personnel, he said.

Ismail believes the Jewish community should empathize with the Yezidis' fate, given their own tragic history of suffering genocide, and because Israelis well understand the kind of neighbourhood they live in. Israel has already aided the Yezidis with humanitarian assistance, but providing arms would help the 4,000 Yezidi fighters defend their community from ISIS jihadis, he said.

Ismail was in northern Iraq recently, near the border with Turkey, where he met Yezidi refugees. They have been living in tents or out in the open since last August, when Islamic State attacks forced Yezidis out of their homes with little more than the clothes on their backs. They found refuge on Mount Sinjar, but many were killed, abducted, raped and sold, he said. His own nieces, ranging in age from nine to 15, suffered that fate, he added.

Altogether, 10,000 Yezidis have been killed in the latest round of atrocities, and another 7,450 have been abducted. About 400 young women managed to escape their captors and find refugee in Yezidi areas, but they suffer from trauma, he said.

The Yezidi community in Canada is hardly equipped to help them. There are only about 50 families across the country, with the largest numbers in London (30 families), Winnipeg (20-25) and the GTA (10).

Ismail himself fled the region in the aftermath of the 1991 Gulf War.

There are about 23,000 Yezidi refugees living in Turkey and another 7,000 or 8,000 in Syria.

"Why not bring the Yezidi [to Canada] now?" he asked. "They will not be of harm to Canada. They are not a missionary religion... Canada would be assured that this religion would not harm the Canadian people," he said. ■

Cotler abstains from Syria vote in House of Commons

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Irwin Cotler broke ranks with the Liberal Party and abstained from voting on the Conservative government's motion to extend and expand Canada's military role against ISIS because he says it gives Syrian President Bashar Assad too much say over the situation.

On the other hand, Cotler has long called for military intervention against jihadist extremism, and specifically in Syria to stop what he considers war crimes perpetrated by the Assad regime.

Federal MPs voted 142-120 on March 30 in favour of extending the mission for up to one year and authorizing air strikes in Syria on ISIS targets. The Liberals and the opposition New Democratic Party did not support the original mission or its extension.

Cotler aide Michael Milech said some other Liberal MPs were absent for the vote, but Cotler was the only member of the party to be present in the House of Commons and to abstain.

Similarly, Cotler abstained in October on the government motion to approve a Canadian combat role in the U.S.-led coalition's campaign against ISIS.

At that time he abstained mainly because he could not abide any co-operation with Assad.

"My main concern has always been the protection of civilians in Syria and Iraq. In October, I was unable to support the government's motion because of the prime minister's statement that Canada would give a veto to the criminal Assad regime," Cotler said in a statement made in advance of the March 30 vote.

"I remain unable to support the government in this matter because its proposed expansion of Canada's mission continues to allow Assad to assault Syrian civilians with impunity. Moreover, the government's lack of clarity in October has only been compounded by a lack of forthrightness since."

However, Cotler is not opposed to military intervention.

"I have been a longstanding proponent together with my Liberal colleagues – of the Responsibility to Protect (R2P) doctrine.... It is because of international inaction three years ago against Syria's criminal Assad regime that radical jihadists including ISIS –have been able to take root, develop, and engage in a campaign of abhorrent brutality."

Cotler, who has represented Montreal's Mount Royal riding since 1999, is not running in the election later this year. ■

Jewish groups back motion on religious attire

JANICE ARNOLD
jarnold@thecjn.ca, MONTREAL

Jewish groups are watching with interest if a court will render an opinion on whether Quebecers' religious attire affects their access to justice.

Constitutional lawyer Julius Grey is scheduled to present a motion in Quebec Superior Court on April 30 seeking a legal opinion clarifying the right to wear such clothing as hijabs, kippot and turbans in the province's judicial system.

Grey and fellow Montreal lawyer Mathieu Bouchard filed the motion on behalf of Rania El-Alloul, the Muslim woman who was told in February by Quebec Court Judge Eliana Marengo to remove her hijab or her petition to get back her impounded car would not be heard. El-Alloul refused and the judge postponed the case. The matter was settled in March and the vehicle was returned.

Grey said this matter is about freedom of religion, equality and access to the courts.

"We are asking to establish a principle, a principle that is a legal one: that you cannot refuse to hear a litigant because of a hijab, a turban, a kippah," Grey was reported saying.

"A judge has to sit and judge between all the people who come, and we would like that to be made clear to all."

B'nai Brith Canada and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) said it supports the motion for clarification on Quebecers' rights. Both organizations felt the judge had no legal grounds to turn away El-Alloul from her court because she was wearing a traditional head scarf.

Marengo's refusal to hear El-Alloul if she wore her hijab is "an apparent violation of religious freedom protected by the Quebec and Canadian Charters of Rights," said lawyer Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

"A legal principle needs to be established that a judge cannot refuse to hear a litigant because he or she may be wearing a hijab, turban or kippah."

David Ouellette, CIJA's associate director for Quebec public affairs, told The CJN that Marengo's decision was "wrong-headed and a denial of justice which should not be allowed to stand as a legal precedent."

It has no basis in law and went beyond even the Parti Québécois proposed charter of values, Ouellette pointed out. That charter would only have banned judges from wearing religious symbols on the grounds that they represent the state and should be – and look – neutral.

Ouellette said he has never heard of someone wearing a kippah being turned away from a court in Quebec. ■

POSITION
Senior Advisor, Centennial Campaign

DESCRIPTION OF THE ORGANIZATION

Federation CJA is the central address for the Jewish community of Montreal. We lead in promoting a vibrant and caring Montreal Jewish community, one in which diversity is welcomed and Jewish life, education and values are nurtured and strengthened. Federation CJA embodies Jewish collective responsibility and advances communal interests locally, nationally, in Israel and beyond. Our fundraising arm, the Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA), raises funds annually from over 16,000 generous donors, enabling us to care for the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity, advocate for our community and stand with Israel.

SUMMARY OF THE POSITION

Federation CJA (FCJA) is looking for a senior endowment professional to help in designing, launching and implementing its centennial campaign to secure the future of the Jewish community of Montreal and to establish a permanent platform and infrastructure for endowments and planned giving. While the target figure of this campaign ("the Campaign") has not yet been determined, the Campaign will include endowed funds already raised for identity-strengthening initiatives, existing legacy gifts and commitments, and one or more capital projects to re-position the community for the realities of the 21st century.

This is a three-year position to advise and consult to both senior professionals and lay leaders of FCJA. We are looking for a highly seasoned endowment professional, with a track record of success in the Jewish federation world, who can forge consensus among top leadership on agreed Campaign goals and strategies, help to secure significant commitments to the Campaign itself, and lay the foundation for the establishment of a permanent endowment infrastructure for FCJA.

The position will be based in Montreal, but will require travel in the Greater Montreal area.

RESPONSIBILITIES

An Advisor will be hired by FCJA to advise and collaborate with its lay and professional leadership on the development and implementation of the Campaign. Reporting to the Chief Development Officer, the Advisor will provide overall direction to the Campaign and will oversee the following work:

- Development of a plan of action for the Campaign with appropriate time lines and educational, recognition and solicitation strategies
- Review and input into a budget developed by the CDO and CEO for the Campaign
- Securing, together with the CDO and CEO, of outstanding lay leadership for the Campaign
- Development and implementation of a strategy for working with lay leadership to make the Campaign successful
- Development of a financial goal for the Campaign
- Education and solicitation of donors as may be appropriate and in consideration of already existing donor relationships
- Education and solicitation of wealth advisors as may be appropriate to enlist their support of the Campaign
- Analysis of the donor base and development of research information as may be appropriate on each
- Development of a data bank of information on projects for funding currently or in the future, and assessment of the community's desire with regard to these two issues
- Development of a working relationship and written understanding with the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal (JCF) with regard to its role in education, investment and asset management of contributed funds, and solicitation of leadership and major gift donors in connection with the Campaign
- Development of recognition strategies and educational programs and events to support the Campaign
- Supervision of staff and/or outside personnel or vendors to carry out all of the above strategies and tactics
- Development of a process to interact with and learn from other North American Jewish communities that have carried out similar campaigns
- Development of a planned giving and endowment infrastructure for FCJA

SKILLS AND ATTRIBUTES

- Strong emotional intelligence including excellent interpersonal, relationship building and leadership skills to interact with a diverse body of lay and professional leaders
- Ability to think strategically and guide others in a strategic planning process
- Proven ability to supervise, lead, mentor, coach and develop a diverse group of professionals
- Significant knowledge of planned giving legal instruments, law, and donor relationship management software
- Proven expertise in planning and executing a multi-faceted, multi-year fundraising campaign
- Experience and knowledge of developing the financial instruments for donors to fund
  - Capital Projects
  - Programmatic Projects
  - Endowments
  - Bequests and Life Insurance Policies
- Awareness and ability to effect both immediate and deferred gift planning endowment strategies
- Keen Understanding of the value and nature of the lay/professional partnership
- Extensive knowledge of the organized Jewish community, its practices and philanthropy
- Extensive knowledge of Jewish culture and values, and keen understanding of current issues in the Jewish world
- Knowledge of and connections to Jewish communities throughout North America, and relationships with key professionals in the field of planned giving and endowment philanthropy

DESIRED QUALIFICATIONS

- Graduate or professional degree in a relevant field
- Ten or more years experience working in or advising the Jewish federation system on endowment and planned giving
- Significant experience stewarding philanthropy with high net worth donors and families

EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS

Full time position; 3-year term

SALARY

Salary in the range of $125,000 - $175,000

BENEFITS

A competitive package will include health, dental, life and disability insurance and pension benefits, 4 weeks' vacation, reimbursement of professional continuing education requirements, and may include a housing and car allowance.

POSTE
Conseiller principal, Campagne du Centenaire

DESCRIPTION DE L'ORGANISATION

La Fédération CJA est l'organe central de la communauté juive de Montréal. Elle est le chef de file de la promotion d'une communauté juive montréalaise dynamique et bienveillante, une communauté ouverte à la diversité qui favorise l'épanouissement et le renforcement de la vie, de l'éducation et des valeurs juives. La Fédération CJA incarne la responsabilité collective juive et fait valoir les intérêts de la communauté localement et nationalement ainsi qu'en Israël et au delà. Son organisme de financement, l'Appel juif unifié, recueille des fonds annuellement auprès de plus de 16 000 donateurs, ce qui lui permet de porter assistance aux membres vulnérables de la communauté, de contribuer au renforcement de l'identité juive, de défendre les droits de la communauté et d'appuyer Israël.

RÉSUMÉ DU POSTE

La Fédération CJA (FCJA) est à la recherche d'un professionnel expérimenté en fonds de dotation qui contribuera à la conception, au lancement et à la mise en place de la campagne de collecte de fonds de son centenaire. Cette campagne a pour mandats d'assurer l'avenir de la communauté juive montréalaise en plus d'établir une plateforme et une infrastructure permanentes pour les fonds de dotation et les dons planifiés. Bien que son objectif ne soit pas encore établi, cette campagne (« la Campagne ») se composera des fonds de dotation existants qui sont destinés à des initiatives de renforcement de l'identité, de legs et d'engagements existants de même que d'un ou de plusieurs projets d'immobilisation visant à l'arrimage de la communauté avec la réalité du 21e siècle.

Le détenteur de ce poste de trois ans conseillera et informera les professionnels principaux et les leaders bénévoles de la FCJA. Ce professionnel chevronné en fonds de dotation devra avoir fait ses preuves dans le monde des fédérations juives, pouvoir dégager un consensus au sein de la haute direction sur les objectifs et les stratégies de la Campagne, pouvoir contribuer à l'obtention d'engagements sérieux envers la Campagne et pouvoir poser les bases de l'infrastructure d'un fonds de dotation permanent pour la FCJA.

Le candidat sélectionné travaillera à Montréal, mais sera appelé à se déplacer dans la région métropolitaine montréalaise.

RESPONSABILITÉS

Le conseiller embauché par la FCJA devra travailler en étroite collaboration avec les leaders professionnels et bénévoles au développement et à la mise en place de la Campagne. Il relèvera du Chef du développement et fournira une orientation globale à la Campagne en plus de superviser :

- Le développement d'un plan d'action pour la Campagne comprenant un calendrier de même que des stratégies d'éducation, de reconnaissance et de sollicitation
- L'examen et les données du budget de la Campagne développé par le Chef du développement et le Chef de la direction
- De concert avec le Chef du développement et le Chef de la direction, la formation d'un groupe exceptionnel de leaders bénévoles pour la Campagne
- Le développement et la mise en place d'une stratège de travail en collaboration avec les leaders bénévoles afin d'assurer le succès de la Campagne
- L'établissement d'un objectif financier pour la Campagne
- L'éducation et la sollicitation des donateurs en fonction des relations existantes avec les donateurs
- L'éducation et la sollicitation des conseillers en gestion du patrimoine pour obtenir leur soutien à la Campagne
- L'analyse de la banque de données des donateurs et le développement des recherches, selon le cas
- La mise au point d'une banque de données de renseignements sur des projets de financement actuels et futurs et l'évaluation des attentes de la communauté relativement à ces deux enjeux
- L'établissement d'une relation de travail et d'une entente écrite avec La Fondation communautaire juive de Montréal (FCJ) quant au rôle de cette dernière dans les secteurs de l'éducation, des placements et de la gestion des actifs des fonds recueillis, la sollicitation des leaders et des grands donateurs en lien avec la Campagne
- Le développement de stratèges de reconnaissance ainsi que de programmes et d'événements éducatifs en appui à la Campagne
- Le travail du personnel interne ou externe ou encore des fournisseurs pour assurer l'exécution des stratèges et des tactiques ci-dessus
- La mise en place d'un processus d'interaction avec les communautés juives d'Amérique du Nord qui ont vécu des campagnes semblables
- Le développement d'une infrastructure de dons planifiés et de fonds de dotation pour la FCJA

COMPÉTENCES ET QUALITÉS REQUISES

- Intelligence émotionnelle supérieure incluant d'excellentes aptitudes en relations interpersonnelles, en établissement de relations et en leadership afin de pouvoir interagir avec un éventail varié de leaders bénévoles et professionnels
- Habileté à penser de manière stratégique et à guider ses collègues dans un processus de planification stratégique
- Habileté reconnue à superviser, diriger, servir de mentor, encadrer et développer un groupe de professionnels
- Solides connaissances des instruments juridiques relatifs aux dons planifiés, de la loi et des logiciels de gestion des relations avec les donateurs
- Expertise reconnue en planification et exécution d'une campagne de collecte de fonds à multiples volets étalée sur plusieurs années
- Expérience et capacité à développer des instruments financiers à l'intention des donateurs pour financer
  - Des projets d'immobilisation
  - Des projets liés à des programmes
  - Des fonds de dotation
  - Des legs et des polices d'assurance-vie
- Connaissances et habileté pour mettre en place des stratèges de dotation pour la planification de don immédiat et différé
- Compréhension approfondie de la valeur et de la nature des partenariats entre bénévoles et professionnels
- Vaste connaissance de la communauté juive organisée, de ses pratiques et de la philanthropie
- Vaste connaissance de la culture et des valeurs juives, compréhension approfondie des enjeux actuels du monde juif
- Relations avec les communautés juives d'Amérique du Nord, liens avec des professionnels clés du domaine des dons planifiés et des fonds de dotation destinés à la philanthropie

COMPÉTENCES RECHERCHÉES

- Diplôme universitaire ou professionnel dans un domaine pertinent
- Expérience d'au moins dix ans à travailler ou à conseiller des organisations du réseau des fédérations juives sur les fonds de dotation et les dons planifiés
- Solide expérience dans le milieu de la philanthropie auprès des familles et des donateurs fortunés

STATUT D'EMPLOI

Poste à temps plein; mandat de trois ans

ÉCHELLE SALARIALE

Le salaire se situe entre 125 000 $ et 175 000 $

AVANTAGES SOCIAUX

Forfait concurrentiel incluant une assurance maladie, une assurance dentaire, une assurance vie et une assurance invalidité longue durée, un régime de retraite, quatre semaines de vacances annuelles, le remboursement des frais de formation professionnelle continue ainsi que la possibilité d'obtenir une indemnité logement et voiture.

MISE EN CANDIDATURE

Les candidats intéressés doivent faire parvenir leur curriculum vitae accompagné d'une lettre de motivation à :

B'nai Brith campaigns to stop Al-Quds Day rally

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

B'nai Brith Canada thinks that getting an early start and the introduction of Bill C-51 might give it a real shot this year at persuading the Ontario Legislative Assembly to prohibit an Al-Quds Day anti-Israel rally from taking place at Queen's Park this summer.

In association with a number of partner organizations, B'nai Brith launched its first "Stop Al-Quds Day" online petition March 25, and by April 1, it had collected more than 1,200 signatures.

Critics of the annual rallies say they promote hatred and anti-Semitism and that a protest calling for Israel's destruction should not be allowed at Queen's Park.

Jewish groups have tried unsuccessfully to have the events banned in the past, and they've brought comments made there to the attention of police, who also monitor the events, but no hate charges have been laid.

B'nai Brith communications officer Sam Eskenasi said that since 2009, his group has lobbied Ontario's three provincial political parties to push the Legislative Assembly to refuse a public permit to Al-Quds Day protesters.

He cited the federal government's recently proposed anti-terror law, Bill C-51, as a reason B'nai Brith's online campaign could gain traction with the legislature.

"We're trying to get our voices heard early this year, because in the past, the [Jewish] community only heard about the rally in the news or in a press release just before it happened," he told The CJN.

The online petition is addressed to David Joseph Levac, speaker of the Legislative Assembly, who is in charge of the grounds where the rally usually takes place: "We the undersigned... demand that you no longer allow hateful rallies promoting propaganda contrary to Canadian values at the seat of government power."

It continues: "With the increasing threat of home-grown radicalization, we cannot allow this anti-western rhetoric to continue unabated on the grounds of our legislature."

International Al-Quds Day, typically celebrated after the fast month of Ramadan, was started in 1979 by Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in solidarity with the Palestinians and in opposition to Zionism and the existence of Israel as a Jewish state.

Al-Quds Day rallies are held annually in cities across Canada and the United States. Last year's rally at Queen's Park was held July 26. Ramadan ends this year on July 17.

STOP AL-QUDS DAY

Screenshot from www.stopalquds.ca

According to an International Al-Quds Day website, "International Day of al-Quds is an annual event supporting a just peace for Palestine, and opposing apartheid Israel's control of Jerusalem."

The website's authors are not specifically identified, and the "About us" section says the Al-Quds Day events are "funded through many small, individual private donations within the U.S. and Canada."

B'nai Brith CEO Michael Mostyn said that "as Canadians, we can no longer tolerate the grounds of our legislature being used for promoting Iranian government propaganda and supporting international terror as can be seen [at past years' protests] by things such as the waving of Hezbollah flags."

Partners of the "Stop Al-Quds Day" initiative include the groups One Free World International, Canadian Thinkers' Forum, Christians United for Israel Canada, Hasbara York and Canadians for Israel's Legal Rights.

Muslim, Pakistani Tahir Gora is director of the non-profit Canadian Thinkers' Forum, whose mission is to "address the challenges of Muslim segregation and radicalization faced in Canadian society."

Gora said his organization supports the campaign because it believes the Al-Quds Day rally is "based on hatred toward communities, especially Jewish... and creates a kind of tension between Jews and Muslims that we don't want to see in Canada."

Mostyn attributed non-Jewish groups' support of the cause to the fact "radicalization is an issue that affects all Canadians" and called the B'nai Brith-led campaign a "non-partisan... grassroots initiative comprised of individuals who believe in a tolerant and pluralistic society."

B'nai Brith has not received an official response yet from the speaker, Eskenasi said, but it expects to, and it hopes to garner more support in advance of the rally.

The petition can be found at www.stopalquds.ca.

Calls to the speaker of the legislature and were not returned by The CJN's deadline, and efforts to reach last year's rally organizers were unsuccessful. ■

GUEST VOICE

Ontario should fund Jewish day schools

Cantor Eric Moses

As a leader in our Jewish community since 2001, I have watched the debates regarding funding for faith-based schools with keen interest. I also have a personal stake in this issue, as I have three children in the Jewish day school system.

I understand the politics of this debate. I understand the history surrounding the Ontario Liberal Party's position on this issue. What I can't grasp is how in today's society, when statistics show that organized religion is on the decline, Ontario is the only province with a significant Jewish population that doesn't partially fund its faith-based schools – unless you're Catholic. Not only does the province not fund faith-based schools, the Liberals repealed the tuition tax credit enacted by the previous Conservative government. How is this possible when we represent the largest Jewish community in Canada?

Ontario embraces its multiculturalism. Toronto is an example to the world of how a model society comprising people from all ethnic backgrounds can work and live together. However, among the provinces containing Canada's main Jewish centres – Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Ottawa – Ontario is the only province that does not provide some form of government funding to its non-Catholic faith-based schools. It is unconscionable to let this hypocrisy continue.

Based on the March 26 CJN article on this subject, in real terms, this means that Ottawa's Jewish high school will be closing its doors at the end of the academic year, while the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto has seen its enrolment decline from 1,500 students to 1,161 today, and somewhere between 1,000 to 1,100 next year.

I attended Premier Kathleen Wynne's Chanukah celebration at Queen's Park with my daughter. I heard the premier's words and those of her caucus members praising the efforts and contributions of the Jewish community to this province. However, without the necessary funding to sustain the education of our young people, they will not know what it is to be Jewish in another generation.

The present cost of a Jewish high school education is in excess of $25,000 per child. With an average family having two to three children, fees aren't sustainable for middle-class working parents. They must make incredible sacrifices and financial choices to give their children a Jewish education. It's a choice fewer are making.

> It is unconscionable to let this hypocrisy continue

We know that this cannot carry on. The cost gap between Jewish day schools and secular private schools has narrowed too much. For those who can afford the fees, many are opting for private schools that have fancier facilities and more extra-curricular activities. I speak to parents on a regular basis about the choices they're making regarding their children's Jewish education or lack thereof. I am speechless, because I am watching this situation unravel before my own eyes. Are we so powerless as a community to right this wrong?

I worked as a cantor in post-referendum Montreal from 1996 to 2000. While there were many negative things an anglophone living in Quebec could say about the Parti Québécois government of the day, it supported and funded Jewish schools, and the enrolment in Montreal's Jewish day schools per capita was exceedingly high.

Why can't Ontario's government do the right thing like British Columbia, Quebec and Manitoba have done? We must urge our MPPs to reopen this discussion. We must be unwavering in our pursuit and make our voices heard on this subject. We cannot sugar-coat this issue. It is blatantly unfair – period! We all know it, but what are we going to do about it? Jewish schools deserve some form of government funding. We owe it to our children.

After all, shouldn't every Jew know the difference between Kiddush and Kaddish? ■

Parliament unanimously passes Cotler's Magnitsky motion

PAUL LUNGEN
plungen@thecjn.ca

Sergei Magnitsky is not that well known in Canada, but in Russia, he's a household name.

That's because he was jailed in his homeland on trumped up charges after exposing massive corruption and theft from state enterprises. He died in custody in November 2009 after nearly one year in jail.

Irwin Cotler, the Liberal MP who has followed the Magnitsky case for several years, presented a motion in Parliament about two weeks ago calling for a Magnitsky law. The motion called for legislation that would impose "sanctions against foreign nationals involved in the detention, torture and death of Sergei Magnitsky."

The motion also asks the government to "explore sanctions as appropriate against any foreign nationals responsible for violations of internationally recognized human rights in a foreign country, when authorities in that country are unable or unwilling to conduct a thorough, independent and objective investigation of the violations."

Sergei Magnitsky

The motion was adopted unanimously and the Conservative government has indicated it will present a bill to sanction officials in any country that are involved in human rights violations.

Cotler first introduced a private member's bill about four years ago calling for a Magnitsky law. The bill called for asset freezes and travel restrictions, among other measures.

> "I'm pleased, but it's in remembrance not only of a great hero, Sergei Magnitsky, but the great hero of the human rights movements in Russia, Boris Nemtsov."

Cotler noted that Boris Nemtsov, one of the most prominent liberal politicians and opposition leaders in Russia, had been a supporter of Magnitsky legislation in Europe to address Russia's "culture of corruption."

Nemtsov had come to Ottawa three years ago to show his support for Cotler's Magnitsky law proposal.

"He called on us to do what we are doing now," Cotler said. "I'm pleased, but it's in remembrance not only of a great hero, Sergei Magnitsky, but the great hero of the human rights movements in Russia, Boris Nemtsov."

"Nemtsov was the leading global advocate for Magnitsky legislation and sanctions. He was a strong supporter outside of Canada for the adoption of this legislation within Canada," Cotler said.

Nemtsov was assassinated in Moscow on Feb. 27. He had criticized widespread official corruption in Russia and had objected to Russian involvement in Ukraine.

Magnitsky was a lawyer and auditor who was hired by Hermitage Capital Management to investigate charges of tax fraud that the company was facing.

Hermitage's co-founder and CEO, Bill Browder, had invested in Russia and had revealed widespread corruption in the country before he was barred from re-entering the country.

During his investigation, Magnitsky uncovered a $230-million tax fraud. He was arrested soon afterward. ■

Students learn about each other at interfaith seder

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

From left, Marwa Salyani, Zahra Jaffer and Sabrina Sefton

About 140 Jewish, Muslim and Catholic students gathered at Leo Baeck Day School's north campus on March 31 to take part in an interfaith Passover seder, in an ongoing effort to build bridges between the faith communities.

Rabbi Noam Katz, Leo Baeck's dean of Jewish living, explained that while this is not the first time As-Sadiq Islamic School and St. Joseph the Worker Catholic School have come together, this is the first year that visits were planned at each school "to enhance and promote the interfaith dialogue and learning."

Last month, Grade 7 Leo Baeck students were invited to As-Sadiq in Thornhill, Ont., where they received an introduction to Islam from the school's imam.

Students from both schools participated in a group-building activity, a tour of the school, a discussion about the similarities between the Jewish and Muslim faiths, and Rabbi Katz was invited to speak about the values of Reform Judaism.

Before Passover, Leo Baeck students hosted As-Sadiq and St. Joseph the Worker students at an interfaith seder.

"Our students are not just in the role of seder leaders, but teachers of some of the Jewish traditions, the symbols on the seder plate, the story of the exodus from Egypt," Rabbi Katz said in advance of the March 31 event.

"But we'll also have some activities that the kids do interactively throughout the course of the seder. So, for example, we come to the piece about the plagues that befell Egypt, and in interfaith groups, the kids will talk around the table about modern-day plagues, whether environmental or man-made."

He said representatives from each school were also invited to speak about their own holidays, such as Easter and Ramadan.

"I think another important goal for us as a school is to make sure that students understand... the commonalities between them," said Yvette Burke, Leo Baeck's principal of the north campus. "And that they are just kids and they do share certain elements of growing up together that are very similar, and to sort of demystify the whole idea that they are not so different."

Rabbi Katz said one of the driving forces behind the initiative is to help students and the rest of the Jewish community, broaden their horizons.

"We want to help our students, and by extension our school and our community, know our neighbours who often live in the same neighbourhoods, but whom they might never speak to without this kind of an experience," Rabbi Katz said.

"One of our Jewish and universal teachings is to love our neighbour as yourself, and my commentary or addendum to that is, how can you love your neighbour if you don't even know your neighbour?"

This interfaith program expanded last year to Leo Baeck's south campus. The Islamic Foundation School and Holy Rosary Catholic School are the other two schools involved.

Burke said the interfaith activities have been positive and eye-opening for the students. "They spoke about it quite a bit and reflected upon it."

As-Sadiq student Zainab Saleh said it was fun to learn about the different religions and meet other students.

"We all have the same hobbies, and even though we're different, we're pretty much the same and we live the same lifestyle. We made many friends and it was fun," Saleh said.

Leo Baeck student Leeor Freiman said, "I showed them my religion and they showed me theirs... It was a great experience and I learned a lot from their cultures and I hope they learned a lot from mine, and I look forward to another time that we do this together."

Following the Pesach break, there are plans to visit the Catholic school. ■

No charges for 'Dawgfather' over tweets, Halifax police say

JOEL JACOBSON
ATLANTIC CORRESPONDENT

Halifax hot dog vendor Jerry Reddick, also known as the Dawgfather, has avoided charges after he posted offensive and disturbing anti-Semitic remarks on social media in January.

"An investigation into the nature of comments posted on a social media site in January has concluded without charges," a spokesperson for Halifax Regional Police said in a statement March 30.

On Jan. 14, Reddick posted several comments on Twitter, some referring to Jews and the Holocaust, including a reference to ovens, as well as the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States.

Police received a complaint about the comments the day they were posted.

In the statement, police spokesperson Pierre Bordages said, "As a result of the investigation, which included consultation with the Public Prosecution Service, investigators determined that the posts do not meet the threshold for a criminal code charge to be laid. While Halifax Regional Police and undoubtedly many other people found these comments distasteful, shocking and offensive, they do not constitute a hate-related offence and the investigation into this matter has been concluded."

Jerry Reddick a.k.a. the "Dawgfather"
TWITTER PHOTO

When confronted about the remarks in January, Reddick said he made the comments to prove a point about the different standards applied to freedom of expression, a hot topic that was under intense debate around the world after the mass shooting at the Paris satirical magazine Charlie Hebdo and the deaths of shoppers at the Hyper Cacher supermarket days before.

However, a couple of days later, Reddick, a proud Muslim who has sold hot dogs outside Dalhousie University's Student Union Building for many years, deleted the controversial postings and apologized.

> I used a sledgehammer instead of a feather to get my point across about the double standard in free speech

"I used a sledgehammer instead of a feather to get my point across about the double standard in free speech. I was wrong and I apologize!" he tweeted.

Speaking March 30, Reddick said he's glad the case is over.

"It wasn't anti-Semitic," he said. "My question was how do you post a picture of a Muslim-looking man with a bomb on his head [and] that's not considered hate speech."

Given the upset his posts caused, Reddick acknowledged he could have been clearer in what he what he was trying to do.

One of Reddick's offending tweets read, "Hitler asked his people, "How do you like your Jews"? Well done with a bagel and a kosher pickle. Freedom of speech goes both ways."

Reddick also tweeted, "What do you call a Jew sitting in one of Hitler's ovens? Toast, because they're cooked. Freedom of speech goes both ways!" And, "What does one Jew say to the other Jew when they walk by a hot oven? Do you recognize anyone?"

Another post read: "In 2001 I thought Americans could fly by the way they were jumping from the twin towers in New York."

Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council, said he was disappointed, but not surprised that charges weren't laid, because it's very difficult to get someone charged under that particular Criminal Code section.

"The threshold is high," Goldberg said. "Whether remarks like that qualify as a prosecution or not, we will never stop my efforts to rebut such comments and to combat this overt anti-Semitism that was shown by the Dawgfather." ■

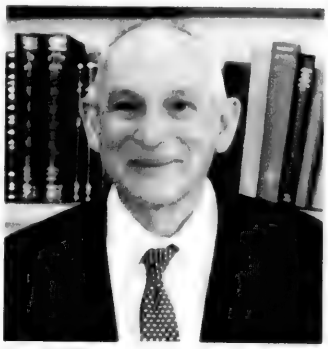
York prof to make aliyah this summer

Toronto Partnership Minyan honouring couple

FRANCES KRAFT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN



Martin Lockshin

York University professor Martin Lockshin and his wife Ruth will fulfil a longstanding dream when they make aliyah at the beginning of the summer. He will be on a one-year sabbatical as of July 1 before retiring next year.

While the Lockshins look forward to joining two of their adult children and four grandchildren who live in Israel (the other two are in the United States), he said, "It is with great sadness that we're anticipating leaving."

Lockshin, who grew up at Beth Tzedec Congregation, has family roots in the city dating back more than 100 years. His grandparents were married here in 1906.

Now winding up a stint as chair of York's humanities department, Lockshin, who turns 64 this month, has been on the faculty since 1978. A former director of the school's Centre for Jewish Studies and a former co-ordinator of its Jewish Teacher Education Program, his main area of academic expertise is the history of Jewish biblical interpretation.

As well, Lockshin, who has smichah from Yeshivat Mercaz Harav Kook in Jerusalem, is a CJN columnist and has served as rabbi and halachic adviser for the Toronto Partnership Minyan (TPM) – one of a small subset of Orthodox congregations offering increased ritual participation for women – since its inception in 2008. The congregation will honour him and his wife on April 19 at an event celebrating the donation of a Torah that Lockshin's late father Louis, a former president of the Jewish National Fund of Canada, bought many years ago.

Over the coming year in Israel, Lockshin's research will focus on the history of pshat, the "plain meaning" interpretation of biblical text. He expects to continue writing and researching after his sabbatical year.

As a Jewish studies professor on a campus that has seen its share of high-profile anti-Israel activity, Lockshin said, "It's a challenge, [but] people have to remember that universities are such better places for Jews now than they were 50 or 60 years ago… There were quotas for Jews entering into university. It was almost impossible for a Jew to become a professor."

When Lockshin was growing up, university-level Jewish studies, as a rule, were only offered at Protestant or Catholic schools of theology, he said.

It wasn't until he was in his early 20s that he met David Berger – then a professor of Jewish studies at Brooklyn College, now the dean of the graduate school of Jewish studies at Yeshiva University – and realized he might be able to pursue an academic career in Jewish studies.

To a certain degree, Lockshin said, he sees the amount of on-campus opposition to the State of Israel as "my fault – our fault – that we're not getting across [Israel's] message well enough." A founder of Canadian Academic Friends of Israel, Lockshin has also met with senior colleagues at York, representing only himself, to discuss issues facing students who are "made to feel uncomfortable" for supporting Israel.

"It's not a problem that was created by the universities," Lockshin said. "It's a problem that exists in Canadian society, and we have to figure out better how to solve it."

To the best of his knowledge, in his early years at York, Lockshin was the only person to wear a kippah on campus. Even among his Jewish studies colleagues at other universities, it was a rarity, he said. But no one ever gave him a hard time about it, he noted, adding that York is "truly a multicultural place."

Neither has it been a problem for him to be an observant Jew in a department where most of his colleagues are not Jewish, he said.

A firm believer in the value of liberal arts and humanities, Lockshin said that those studies "give you a wonderful education that will help you in life in everything you're doing." He said that a former student of his, now a lawyer, told him that learning to read and interpret biblical text has helped him to critically read law texts.

"I still believe in this enterprise called the liberal arts," Lockshin said. Many years ago, as a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, he didn't imagine that his Latin courses would be useful in his future career. "You never know what's going to be practical." ■

'Torah relay' marks Ottawa shul's move uptown

DIANE KOVEN
OTTAWA CORRESPONDENT

A weekend of festivities marked the end of an era as Congregation Beth Shalom concluded its 60-year history as Ottawa's "downtown shul."

The culmination of the March 27-29 weekend – which included a sold-out (with large waiting list) Shabbat dinner; a celebratory Shabbat service and kiddush that honoured all past presidents of the congregation; and a Saturday night open mike musical event that lasted into the wee hours – was a unique 10-kilometre Torah relay walk.

"We wanted to involve as many of our congregants as possible," said the Conservative congregation's vice-president, Jane Shore, as she explained the plan for moving the sacred Torah scrolls from the old location to the congregation's temporary new location at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) in the city's west end.

Sixty years ago, when the synagogue was built, the hub of the Jewish community was downtown, but over the years, Jews moved to the suburbs and the congregation dwindled. It currently has about 300 families.

In 2011, the congregation voted to sell its 81,000-square-foot property, which will be redeveloped with condominiums and retail space.

The congregation has a one-year lease with the SJCC, where it will hold Shabbat and holiday services. Weekday services will take place next door at Hillel Lodge seniors residence. There have been ongoing discussions about amalgamation with conservative Agudath Israel Congregation, but as of now, no decisions have been made about where Congregation Beth Shalom will find itself at the end of its Soloway lease.

For the Torah relay, it was decided that volunteers would carry the scrolls the entire way, passing them from hand to hand as they went.

"Each segment was eight minutes and we [did] it in groups. Some groups [were] families, some were friends," Shore said. "The route went past City Hall, through Centretown where many Jews lived at one time. Many people chose the section according to where they had lived."

After a brief send-off at the old Chapel Street location and good wishes from Israeli Ambassador Rafael Barak and several local politicians, the relay began.

One of the first group of carriers was Dan Kimmel.

"My family joined the synagogue in 1960 and we have been members ever since. I was president from 1980 to '83," he said.

The walk's logistics were co-ordinated by board members Lorne Goldstein and Suzi Sauve, and it was a daunting task. People had to be at the right place at the right time in order to keep the relay going and keep the group together. A few people – including Liberal MP Mauril Belanger, who represents Ottawa-Vanier – walked the entire 10 kilometres.

At exactly 1 p.m., the target arrival time, the group arrived at the SJCC singing Hava Nagila and were met by enthusiastic supporters who accompanied them inside. As the Torahs were placed inside the ark, there was singing and dancing, followed by a quick Minchah service led by Beth Shalom spiritual leader Cantor Daniel Benlolo.

Many in the audience were visibly emotional as they and their families had grown up in the synagogue, marking all their important family milestones there. ■

GUEST VOICE

Jewish children need Jewish foster parents

Rabbi Ronald Weiss

What would you do if you met a child who was lost?

I have no doubt that virtually everyone who encounters a lost child crying in the street or at the mall would stop and offer assistance. I believe most people would try to calm the child and call 911 to alert the authorities of the whereabouts of the child. Then, I believe, most people would stay with the child until help arrives. I do not know many people who would continue on their way, leaving a lost child behind without the benefit or protection of adult supervision.

But what if the child was not lost in the street or at the mall? What if the child was lost in life? What would our response be then? What if the child was lost because he or she was bereft of a family or deprived of a home?

Children are the most vulnerable members of society. Every thinking person understands the fragility of a child's situation and the fundamental dependence a child has for a loving, caring, family.

Pre-eminent among the many indisputable truths in our society is the certainty that every child needs – and deserves – a home.

A place of safety and refuge, a home is where a child can grow and develop nurtured by the love, warmth and security of a family. It almost goes without saying that the absence of such a home in the life of a child can be devastating.

While many may live with the illusion that Jews don't have this type of problem, the harsh reality is that many families in our community today are troubled and do not function well. As the government mandated child welfare agency in the Jewish community, Jewish Family & Child works with families having difficulties in order to help keep them intact and improve their ability to work through their challenges in a healthy fashion.

We are pleased to announce that the number of children coming into the care of JF&CS continues to fall. This means that we, as an agency, are doing a better job at helping parents adapt, learn and grow in response to changes in the life of a family. Strengthening families makes them more resilient in dealing with the myriad of challenges we all face daily.

Nevertheless, we are not always successful. In those extreme cases where a family's problems actually place a child at risk, the need to provide a safe and secure environment for that child requires a foster home setting. A foster home is where people who care about the welfare of all children open their home and their hearts to give a child a place in their family.

The Talmud teaches us (Ketubot 50a) about one who is constantly involved in the mitzvah of tzedakah. Here the term tzedakah does not refer to giving money to charity, but of the literal translation acting righteously. One who gives charity is a person who acts righteously but, of course, there are other activities through which one behaves in a righteous fashion. When the Talmud speaks of one who is involved in tzedakah at all times, the example it cites is one who raises and gives support to a child. Providing a safe haven to a child is seen by our sages as the pinnacle of continuous righteousness.

The first priority of foster care is always for the children in care to go home to their natural families. Sadly, this is not always possible. In the event a child or youth cannot go home to their biological family, we need to keep them connected to our community. Research has shown that the best way to do this is to keep them attached to a family that cares about them. (The same research demonstrates that there are poor outcomes for youth who age out of care. They often struggle. They frequently feel alone and disconnected from most things Jewish.)

There is only one thing worse than a troubled family placing a child at risk – and that is not having a safe place for that child – a place that can help restore the child's sense of well-being.

The message is simple: Jewish children need Jewish foster parents. ■

Jewish prisoners tend to be marginalized, rabbi says

"I feel we do a good job within the constraints placed upon us in meeting the needs of those Jews in jail," he says. "The institutions by and large are very understanding and will do what they can to meet legitimate and reasonable requests. But individuals in custody are not happy campers – they're legitimately unhappy with their situation. I wish we could do more for them, but we're not lawyers, we're not able to put up bail or sign on as surety. There are specific rules within which we have to operate."

There were 50 Jewish inmates in Ontario jails 20 years ago, but today Weiss estimates the number is closer to 75.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein

> When Jewish inmates have needs that come to our attention, we meet them to the best of our ability
> Rabbi Ronald Weiss

"When Jewish inmates have needs that come to our attention, we meet them to the best of our ability in working with the institutions," he says.

In some cases, this involves making tfillin available to Jewish inmates who want to put them on. Jail can present significant challenges to daily observance, Rabbi Weiss says. In most cases, an inmate can only put on tfillin under supervision because the straps are deemed a security risk by the Ministry of Correctional Services.

Funding for visits to Jewish inmates and to support the expenses of institutions such as Maison Belfield in Montreal is direly needed, Rabbi Silberstein says.

"Prayer books cost money and so does the seder, the tfillin and the food we bring to Jewish inmates each week," he says. "Our halfway house is also an expensive proposition, with a mortgage and heating to be paid and the costs of regular living supplies in addition to food, clothing and therapy."

Chabad of Richmond, B.C., recently replaced its High Holiday prayer books and was looking for a new home for its several hundred older versions, which were still in great condition. When Rabbi Yechiel Baitelman posted on a Chabad site that he was ready to pass them on, the first request came not from Canada, but from Rabbi Binyomin Scheiman in Illinois.

The founder of the Hinda Institute (formerly known as the Jewish Prisoners' Assistance Foundation), Rabbi Scheiman's organization aids families of Jews incarcerated, arranges visitation for incarcerated Jews in Illinois jails and helps with their re-entry process once they are released. He jumped at the opportunity to receive the machzorim. "We estimate there are up to 150 Jews incarcerated in the state of Illinois and these High Holiday prayer books are so important," he reflected. "For Jewish inmates, Rosh Hashanah is a time in their life when they're very open and repenting for mistakes they've made in their lives. The prayer books are an extremely generous contribution."

In general, Jewish prisoners are very marginalized within Jewish communities, sometimes even demonized, Rabbi Scheiman says. "It's even worse than being forgotten – they and their families are sometimes shunned by the community." He works closely with the Chabad-affiliated Aleph Institute, an American organization founded in 1983 and one that has branches in many different states. One of its missions is to provide professional services to nearly 4,000 Jewish men and women in U.S. federal and state prisons and their approximately 25,000 spouses, children and parents left behind.

No such organization exists in Canada, though various rabbis in different parts of the country carry out initiatives on their own. Rabbi Baitelman visits the roughly six to 12 Jewish inmates in Metro Vancouver jails from time to time, and tries to send Purim packages to them on Purim. In Vancouver, semi-retired Jewish Renewal Rabbi Dina-Hasida Mercy has served as the Jewish chaplain to Pacific region federal prisons since 2012 and takes weekly excursions into B.C.'s Fraser Valley, where there are 10 federal prisons, to meet with the small number of Jewish inmates there and any others who want to talk to her. "There are definitely people in my group that are not halachically Jewish," she says.

'Inmates need a way to regain self-sufficiency'

A basic need they all share is for a kind, listening ear, one that won't judge them and report on them, she says. She's also committed to practical projects, including the delivery of donated prayer books and general Jewish literature into the federal institutions. As a woman visiting men in jail, Rabbi Mercy says she's never felt physically threatened.

"The guys tend to be fairly protective of their chaplains," she says. "In many ways the prisons are far safer than the city streets, because the inmates have been called to task for their offences and are monitored, whereas out in the community, you have people who might still be in their crime cycle."

There isn't enough support and understanding for inmates in the Jewish community and the wider community in general, she laments. "It's a societal perception that bad guys are put away and should stay away, but these people need to find jobs and take a place in the community when they come out. Many have just committed incredibly stupid mistakes in judgment with terrible consequences, but they need our help to reintegrate into community."

> Because someone committed a crime, this means he or she should not do another mitzvah

What's needed, she says, is a halfway house based on Jewish values, a place that might offer a job bank, educational opportunities and perhaps even a small business where they can get work experience. "Inmates need a way to regain their self-sufficiency. They come out of prison with $80, which is barely enough to get you from the Fraser Valley into Vancouver. As a society, we need to work on our compassion for people who want to rebuild their lives, and yes, it means doing things that are not comfortable for us."

Rabbi Menachem Matusof, head of Chabad in Alberta, has visited Jewish inmates in Alberta jails for the past 27 years. He estimates there's six to 12 incarcerated Jews in his province at any given time and finds funding a challenge. "The visitations take time and the travel expenses mount, books for inmates cost money and the process of getting security clearance each year is demanding," he says.

Rabbi Menachem Matusof

Sometimes, there are conflicts. One year he brought a mobile sukkah to the Jewish women's jail in Calgary, where an inmate was incarcerated for murder. In an old newspaper interview, Rabbi Matusof was asked why he would bother doing this for a murderer. "Murdering is a much bigger issue than sukkah and lulav," he was told. "My response was this: because someone committed a crime one time, this means he or she should not do another mitzvah? What does one have to do with another? The murder was being handled by the courts. Meanwhile, this is still a Jewish individual who needs help, and we're here to help them at whichever level they need."

He describes most of the Jewish inmates he visits as "sweet, wonderful people who unfortunately got caught in bad situations. It's not our place to judge," he says. "We need to reach out and help people wherever they are."

There are also schemers, and Rabbi Matusof gets lots of requests from non-Jewish inmates who want to speak with him about possible conversions to Judaism. His response is always to wait until they are released from jail, "but once they're out, they no longer have interest!" Other inmates claim they are Jewish and want kosher meals. "We talk to them and find out immediately if they're telling the truth," he says. "Most of the time, I'm not fooled." ■

Obama and Netanyahu dig in for fight over Iran

URIEL HEILMAN
JTA WASHINGTON

For U.S. President Barack Obama, the framework agreement reached April 2 with Iran is a "historic understanding" that does more to roll back Tehran's nuclear program than any possible alternative and avoids the risk of a destructive war in the Middle East.

But to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, it's the complete opposite: a pact that "threatens the survival of Israel" and would "increase the risks of nuclear proliferation in the region and the risks of a horrific war."

With many of the deal's details yet to be worked out before the June 30 deadline for a comprehensive agreement, the fight is on over whether the outline of an accord reached this week is the best the United States and Europe can do to stop Iran's progress toward a nuclear weapon.

Critics say the Obama administration should press Iran harder for a better deal. Obama insists the agreement is the best one possible.

"Iran is not going to simply end its program because we demand it to do so," the president said at a White House news conference April 2.

The agreement reached between Iran and the six world powers – the United States, Russia, China, the U.K., France and Germany – has three main components:

• Iran will not develop weapons-grade plutonium, and the core reactor of its nuclear facility at Arak will be dismantled or removed from the country.

• Iran will reduce the number of its operating centrifuges by two-thirds, to 5,060; won't enrich uranium using advanced centrifuges for at least 10 years; and will cut its current stockpile of uranium from some 10,000 kilograms to 300 kilograms for 15 years.

• International inspectors will have unprecedented access to Iranian nuclear facilities and their entire supply chain.

In exchange, Iran will get relief from certain U.S. and United Nations sanctions, and the relief will be phased in as Iran takes steps to meet its end of the bargain. If Iran violates the deal, those sanctions will be restored. According to Obama, the deal ensures that Iran's "breakout time" to acquiring a nuclear weapon is at least a year and imposes strict limitations upon Iran's nuclear program for at least 15 years.

Many details remain murky. It's unclear how fast the sanctions will disappear, exactly what steps Iran must take in order for them to be removed, or how they would be restored in the event Iran fails to meet its obligations. The framework agreement also does not say what will happen to the uranium that Iran must give up.

Critics say the deal allows Iran to continue working on perfecting its advanced centrifuges so that, once the deal expires, Tehran can more quickly assemble a nuclear weapon. In a rare statement by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), the organization said it's concerned that the deal could leave Iran as a nuclear threshold state, igniting a nuclear arms race in the Middle East.

"Some claim that the only alternatives to this framework are capitulation or military action. We reject that assertion," the AIPAC statement said. "A clear alternative to a bad deal remains the good deal that is achieved by the application of increased economic and political pressure on Tehran to reach an agreement that transparently does not allow Iran a path to nuclear weapons capability."

AIPAC called for the agreement to be subject to review by Congress, where there is more skepticism than in the White House about the deal's chances of success.

While Obama does not need congressional approval for the deal, he promised that he would brief members of Congress and welcomed a "robust debate" on the deal. Congress could scuttle the agreement with a veto-proof majority prepared to vote against the deal or if it approves new sanctions on Iran.

Republican Senator Bob Corker, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said after the deal's announcement that the United States "must remain clear-eyed regarding Iran's continued resistance to concessions, long history of covert nuclear weapons-related activities, support of terrorism and its current role in destabilizing the region."

Corker is the lead sponsor of a bill that would require congressional review of the nuclear deal.

House Speaker John Boehner, who was in the Middle East last week and held a joint news conference with Netanyahu, said Congress must be allowed to "fully review the details of any agreement before any sanctions are lifted."

In his news conference Obama acknowledged the battle he'll face in Congress.

"The issues at stake here are bigger than politics; these are matters of war and peace," the president said.

The U.S. administration also faces skepticism from Sunni Arab allies in the Middle East who feel threatened by Iran's Shiite regime and fear that America is reaching out to Tehran at the expense of its friends in Saudi Arabia, the Persian Gulf and elsewhere. Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia have expressed alarm similar to Israel's about Iran's nuclear program.

In a nod to those concerns, Obama said he had invited the Saudi king and the leaders of half a dozen Gulf countries to join him at Camp David later this spring to discuss regional concerns. Obama also lifted a freeze on U.S. military aid to Egypt that had been in place since 2013, when the military deposed the country's democratically elected president, Mohamed Morsi of the Muslim Brotherhood, and installed Abdel Fatah Sisi in his place.

Egypt and Saudi Arabia are the main Arab power centres in the Middle East and rivals of Iran; both countries are expected to pursue nuclear weapons of their own if they believe Iran is on a quick path to the bomb.

With the recent overthrow of Yemen's U.S.-allied president by Shiite Houthi rebels aligned with Iran, Tehran's allies now control four capitals in the region: Sana (Yemen), Damascus, Baghdad and Beirut.

Critics say the new agreement will enhance Tehran's ability to further threaten and destabilize the region. The deal does not address Iran's support for terrorism or the threats Iranian officials continue to lob toward Israel. In addition, they say, Iran's track record of lying, obfuscating and failing to fulfill previous commitments to allow inspection of its nuclear facilities does not bode well for its future compliance.

While Iranian and Western negotiators engaged in marathon sessions in Switzerland last week in an attempt to meet a self-imposed March 31 deadline for an agreement, the outline they presented April 2 – two days late – is still missing many key elements.

"Those details matter," Obama said. "Our work is not yet done."

But the president said if a deal can be made and Iran follows through, "we will be able to resolve one of the greatest threats to our security, and to do so peacefully."

Nuclear deal leaves Israel with few options

MITCH GINSBURG
JERUSALEM

From an Israeli security perspective, the framework deal reached in Switzerland on April 2 with Iran will require three central efforts – in the realms of intelligence, diplomacy, and, perhaps, in Israel's regional posture.

The latter may be the most pressing. Israel has sat on the fence since the Arab Spring melted into sectarian war in March 2011.

Recently, a resident of the Israeli town of Majdal Shams, a Druze Assad loyalist, went to great pains, primarily via Facebook, to show that Israel was not merely an implacable foe behind a thick steel fence, but an active agent in Jabhat Nusra's battle against Bashar Assad and Iran's Hezbollah henchmen. Sudki Makat, a former security prisoner who has been re-arrested, posted videos, primarily against a dark night backdrop, of border regions where, he claimed, without providing evidence, Israeli troops were meeting with members of the Al Qaeda affiliate.

A senior military source confirmed in March that there have been debates within the Israel Defense Forces' General Staff regarding Israel's posture and which side it should prefer in the battle that still rages in Syria, but said that the prevailing understanding is that the forces run by Iran's al-Quds Force commander Qassem Soleimani, a highly competent operative and one of the most influential regional actors, are a more dangerous foe.

The immediate repercussions of the world powers' deal with Iran – and Iran will surely portray the results as a glorious victory and vindication – is not a sprint to the bomb, but rather an emboldened posture across the region.

Iran-backed forces currently control four Arab capitals: Damascus, Beirut, Baghdad, and Sana in Yemen. Incredibly, even while its diplomatic chiefs were seated around tables in Lausanne, Iran aided – some say initiated – the Houthi overthrow of the Yemeni leadership.

With the deal in hand, Iran will likely take more strident steps. Israel, of course, will have to act to defend its immediate interests, such as the Iranian attempt to set up a Hezbollah front along the northern Golan Heights, as occurred in January. But it may, at least covertly, also have to increase the aid it provides to its allies as borders melt and the balance of power shifts more toward Tehran.

Diplomatically, the overt rift with the Obama administration is troubling in too many ways to detail here. But the key, from a security perspective, relates to understandings that might, at a future date, enable a military strike against Iran's nuclear facilities. Today, that option is off the table. Israel cannot act now in open defiance of the entire world. That window closed, as then-defence minister Ehud Barak warned it would (albeit for different reasons), sometime in early 2012. And while many, including the past two army chiefs of staff and the former heads of the Mossad and Shin Bet, were against a strike then, the debate has always been about timing, not need.

Israel is quite certain that the regime in Tehran will, as it has for the past two decades, begin cheating on the agreement when the time seems right. It will likely be a careful and well-calibrated advance.

In order to thwart such a move, Israel needs rock-solid intelligence. With a deal in hand and a presumed one-year buffer between Iran and the bomb, convincing the world powers of a violation so significant that it demands action will be a Herculean task.

It bears mentioning that in the summer of 2007 the prime minister of Israel reportedly showed up in the Oval Office with photos stolen from the computer of Ibrahim Othman, the head of the Syrian Atomic Energy Commission; the three dozen colour photos, the New Yorker reported in 2012, depicted a North Korean-made plutonium reactor near the Euphrates River. Israeli commandos, at great risk, had collected soil samples from the site. And still president George Bush, an uncommonly strong advocate for Israel, did not agree to launch a military strike.

He did, however, according to his own account, agree to let Israel do what it felt necessary.

At this stage, for Israel to possess a credible military option against Iran's nuclear program – and it is crucial that it possess one – the prime minister might want to weigh carefully how much effort he puts into rousing opposition to the deal in Congress during the coming months. And how much he invests in reaching an accord with the administration, alongside the nuclear deal, that would cement Israel's ability to act in the event of flagrant violations. ■

Netanyahu, Obama differ over Iranian nuclear deal

JTA
WASHINGTON

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu took to U.S. airwaves to criticize the framework agreement between Iran and the world powers on Iran's nuclear program, as U.S. President Barack Obama defended the deal while reassuring Israel that it stands by the Jewish state.

Netanyahu appeared on April 5 morning news programs on ABC, NBC and CNN.

"The entire world celebrated the deal with North Korea. It deemed to be a great breakthrough. It would bring an end to North Korea's nuclear program. You'd have inspectors. That would do the job. And of course everybody applauded it, but it turned out to be a very, very bad deal, and you know where we are with North Korea," Netanyahu told NBC's Meet the Press.

"I think the same thing would be true in the case of Iran, except that Iran is a great deal more dangerous than North Korea. It's a militant Islamic power bent on regional domination, in fact, bent on world domination, as it openly says so. They just chanted 'Death to America' a few days ago on the streets of Tehran, the same streets where they're rejoicing right now.

"Don't give the pre-eminent terrorist state of our time the access to a nuclear program that could help them make nuclear weapons. It's very bad for all of us," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu told CNN that under the deal, Iran's nuclear infrastructure will remain in place, with "not a single centrifuge destroyed, not a single nuclear facility shut down, including the underground facilities that they built illicitly. Thousands of centrifuges will keep spinning, enriching uranium. That's a very bad deal.

"They're getting a free path to the bomb," Netanyahu said.

Democrat Jewish Senator Dianne Feinstein told CNN's State of the Union that the agreement does not threaten Israel's survival and that Netanyahu should "contain himself, because he has put out no real alternative. In his speech to the [U.S.] Congress – no real alternative. Since then – no real alternative."

Meanwhile, U.S. President Barack Obama defended his pursuit of a diplomatic resolution of the standoff over Iran's nuclear program and vowed to defend Israel.

In a lengthy interview April 4 with columnist Thomas Friedman of the New York Times, Obama acknowledged that Israel

"is right to be concerned about Iran," noting the regime's denial of the Holocaust and repeated threats to eliminate the Jewish state.

Still, Obama reiterated his view that a negotiated agreement with the Islamic Republic is the best strategy to prevent the country from acquiring a nuclear weapon while "sending a very clear message to the Iranians and to the entire region that if anybody messes with Israel, America will be there.

"There is no formula, there is no option, to prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon that will be more effective than the diplomatic initiative and framework that we put forward — and that's demonstrable," Obama said.

Obama called the opportunity to reach an agreement with Iran a "once-in-a-lifetime opportunity." Comparing his engagement with Iran to his diplomatic opening with Cuba, Obama asserted that the United States could pursue detente with Tehran without risking its core strategic interests.

Obama spoke at length about Israel's concerns about Iran, acknowledging that Israel is more vulnerable to Iran than the United States and that Israel is right to be worried about the regime's expressed desire to destroy the Jewish state and its denial of the Holocaust.

"But what I would say to [the Israelis] is that not only am I absolutely committed to making sure that they maintain their qualitative military edge, and that they can deter any potential future attacks, but what I'm willing to do is to make the kinds of commitments that would give everybody in the neighbourhood, including Iran, a clarity that if Israel were to be attacked by any state, that we would stand by them," Obama said. "And that, I think, should be... sufficient to take advantage of this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see whether or not we can at least take the nuclear issue off the table." ■

Israeli man fakes his own kidnapping

JTA
JERUSALEM

The Israeli man who faked his own kidnapping said he did so because criminals were looking for him due to his massive gambling debts.

Niv Asraf, 22, was found alive on April 3 in Kiryat Arba.

Asraf told interrogators, according to reports: "I got mixed up in gambling and owed tens of thousands of shekels. The debt grew and grew because I couldn't pay back what I owed. Criminals are chasing after me and won't let up. I was afraid to tell police about them and my salary from work is not enough to pay the amount they want, so I panicked. I didn't mean to stage a kidnapping. I took a sleeping bag and some canned food in order to disappear for a few days."

The story contradicts a version offered by Asraf's accomplice, Eran Nagaukar, who said his friend staged the kidnapping to get the attention of his former girlfriend.

Asraf remained in jail over the weekend; he is accused of giving false evidence, breach of public order and obstruction of a police officer's performance of duty.

The search for Asraf last week involved some 3,000 soldiers and cost hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Israeli security forces were alerted to Asraf's disappearance on April 2 by Nagaukar. Asraf reportedly entered the Palestinian village of Beit Anun, near Hebron, to get help after he and the friend became stranded with a flat tire.

Three Israeli teens were kidnapped and killed last summer near the same West Bank area. ■

Israel's security cabinet opposes deal with Iran

Looming behind all this is whether the nuclear deal could lead to gradual detente between Iran and the West, though Obama administration officials insist that is not the goal of these negotiations. Critics charge that Obama's quest for a transformative moment is clouding his judgment when it comes to Iran.

On April 3, Israel's security cabinet met and expressed unanimous opposition to the deal, according to the Prime Minister's Office.

"On the Iranian issue there is no opposition and no coalition," Yair Lapid, head of Israel's Yesh Atid party, said. "We are all concerned that the Iranians will circumvent the deal, and Israel must protect its own security interests."

Canada's Foreign Affairs Minister Rob Nicholson said Canada will continue to judge Iran by its actions not its words.

"To that end, Canada is announcing a contribution of $3 million to support the International Atomic Energy Agency efforts to monitor Iranian compliance with its commitments."

David Cape, chairman of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), said Canada and Israel have long shared a desire for the Iranian nuclear crisis to be resolved through a diplomatic process and that it's crucial that any agreement ensures the Iranian nuclear program is, and remains, exclusively peaceful.

"Canada's position is based on a non-partisan consensus that a nuclear-armed Iran would be an unacceptable threat to regional stability, global security, and – given the Iranian regime's genocidal statements – Israel's very existence," he said. "Today's announcement of the parameters for a final deal, and President Obama's public remarks, underscore the need for all parties in Canada to reinforce these requirements and reaffirm the Canadian consensus." ■

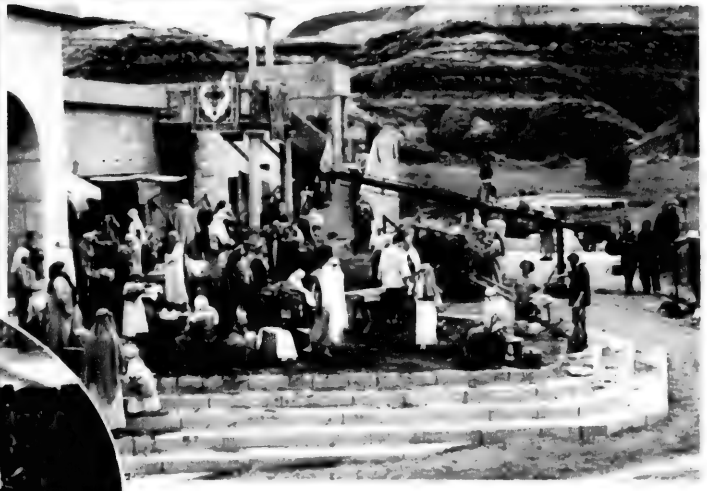
Jewish Life

Local filmmaker fascinated by Judaism and Israel



Israeli-Canadian filmmaker Igal Hecht (pictured left), is working on a docudrama television series about women in the Bible, partially shot in Alberta (set pictured above).

JODIE SHUPAC
jshupac@thecjn.ca

In some ways, Igal Hecht's approach to making documentary films is quite hands-off.

The Israeli-Canadian filmmaker, 37, and founder of Chutzpa Productions, has been determined to avoid what he calls the "North American, Michael Moore-style" of self-insertion in his movies.

"I hate that idea of, 'I'm the director and I'm going to be the champion,'" Hecht explained. "My job is to allow the people who I came to make the film about to be at the forefront."

Having directed close to 40 films, a number of which have been shown at international film festivals both Jewish and not, his most recent projects include Daughters of Eve, a docudrama television mini-series set to air in North America next fall, about iconic women from the Old and New Testaments and A Woman's Story, a film by director Azra Rashid that Hecht co-produced, about female survivors of 20th century genocides.

He recently teamed up with distribution company Syndicado, which is in the process of showcasing a dozen or so of his documentaries on video on demand web sites such as Vimeo, Amazon and Hulu – eight have already been posted.

While he avoids the spotlight in his movies, Hecht hardly shies away from looking at controversial issues from a certain slant – indeed, he said the very spirit of his production company is to address matters "no one wants to talk about" – and his oeuvre contains numerous films on political and social issues in Israel and Palestine, including Israel's 2005 disengagement from Gaza, the Israeli settler movement and LGBTQ Palestinians living in Israel. In Not in My Name, produced in 2005, Hecht examines the political Jewish left in North America.

"I disagree with a lot of the Jewish left. I think they're shielding anti-Semitism," Hecht said. "But I still wanted them to have their say. I presented counter-arguments and then let the viewer decide who they want to believe or not believe."

In Disengaging Democracy, made in 2006, he takes a hard look at the effects of Israel's unilateral pullout from Gaza on Jewish settlers in Gush Katif, underscoring the settlers' pain at being evacuated from their homes, their inability to find suitable homes or work following the evacuation, their sense of injustice at what they felt was insufficient support and infrastructure from government after the fact and the Israeli media's failure to report on their struggles.

The film's follow-up, The Hilltops, which premiered at the 2011 Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Film Festival, looks at leaders within the Jewish settler community in the West Bank as they campaign to hold onto what they perceive as biblically-inherited land.

Hecht disagrees with criticism that The Hilltops is a pro-settler movie. "I just try to present the reality that exists…I don't think it's a [pro-settler movie], but what I didn't do – that is commonly done to settlers – is I didn't demonize them."

He stressed he's not an advocate for settlers, nor does he agree with many of their views, but wished to highlight the ways the Gaza withdrawal represented a breakdown in Israeli democracy.

"It was shameful. The media was so hell-bent on having the disengagement go through, they decided they were going to avoid asking certain questions and omit facts," he said. "Top members of the Israeli media later conceded they'd lied, and that they didn't talk about what would happen after the pullout."

After five or six years spent making films about weighty political situations, Hecht said he began to feel somewhat burnt out.

His later works, then, like television show Muzika, which explores voices in contemporary Israeli music and has aired weekly in North America for several years, and the acclaimed A Universal Language (2013), which documents six Canadian Yuk Yuk comedians as they tour Israel, have been more socially or culturally-focused.

"A lot of filmmakers want to focus on the bad [in Israel], and while there are a lot of contentious issues there, the political is not the only thing that defines it," Hecht said.

He is particularly interested in capturing women's issues around the world, he said. For A Woman's Story, he and Rashid traveled to Bangladesh, Rwanda and Poland to document the experiences of three separate women who are survivors of three separate genocides, one being the Holocaust.

While he hopes to continue evolving beyond making films exclusively about Israel, Hecht said it remains a significant interest of his.

"Judaism and Israel have always fascinated me. The world of diaspora Jewry is fascinating – more so today than before," he said. ■

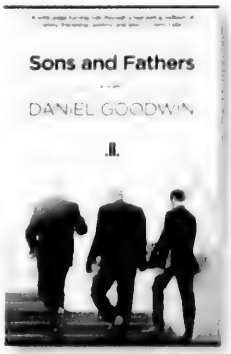
Canadian political crisis told through three distinct voices



Sons and Fathers
Daniel Goodwin
Linda Leith Publishing Inc

MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

It's rare when we have an opportunity to examine a single event through multiple, disparate lenses or illuminate a singular truth through the refractive light of a multi-faceted diamond. But this is precisely the literary device Daniel Goodwin uses in his recently published novel Sons and Fathers. He tells us a story that revolves around three individuals through each of the men's distinct voices and unique perspectives.

And he does so to deeply satisfying effect.

The story is absorbing. Most of us are fascinated by the intrigues in the halls of government and Sons and Fathers deals with political crisis at the highest level of government, namely, with the prime minister, his main communications adviser and an enterprising, veteran journalist at a national newspaper.

The prime minister, adviser and reporter are Allan, Eli and Michael respectively. Each grew up in Montreal. Eli and Michael were childhood friends. But at university their friendship evolved into something far less, due to their shared interest in and rivalry for the affection of a beautiful woman. Eli and Michael meet Allan at McGill. Their lives intersect somewhat symbiotically from that point on.

Each man has been profoundly influenced by his father. These fathers hover throughout the novel somewhat like guidance counsellors at a high school who are visited occasionally for advice or assurance by trusting students. The fathers – for good or for ill – have sculpted their sons' characters and thus, perhaps, are most responsible for steering them toward the destiny that each son then further shapes for himself.

The political crisis creates the tension in the plot. But it also serves as Goodwin's narrative pretext for exploring the rich veins of political and philosophical reflections, social interactions, the possibilities of language and the ultimate human issues that lie just below the surface.

Each of the three men "speaks" to the reader and shares his particular insights regarding situations and people. But Eli tells the majority of the tale. And the reader is the fortunate beneficiary of Eli's narrative predominance because it is to Eli that the sheer beauty and poignancy of language mean the most. Eli's father is a renowned poet who infuses in his son curiosity and reverence for the esthetics of words well used and thoughts meaningfully conveyed.

To be sure, Michael has a sleek facility with words too. But as a journalist, his overarching concern is in the mastery of technique for the purpose of conveying meaning economically and efficiently, and of getting the message out within the unyielding confines of limited page space. Michael's father is an academic for whom the use of language is the means for recording thought. It is clear that Michael has inherited his father's utilitarian sense of language.

Allan is a master orator whose embrace of language is through the music and drama of the spoken word. Allan's father was one of Canada's most successful and respected federal cabinet ministers. And the son undoubtedly learned a great deal about the spoken word from his father. But Allan's ability to communicate, to persuade and inspire as a speaker is not the result of studied technique alone. It is the result of the substance of the man's words combined with the substance of the man himself.

Goodwin spends a great deal of time developing the characters of the three men, writing through their intersecting relationships about life's sustaining foundations, such as friendship, loyalty, sacrifice, empathy, compassion and love.

However, there are many other pleasing aspects to the book.

Goodwin provides authentic insights to the world of politics and journalism. Borrowing from his considerable experience as a journalist, communications and government relations' executive, the Montreal-born Goodwin thoughtfully expounds upon the roles and natures – in theory and in practice – of journalists and journalism, of politicians and politics, of ethics and cynicism, and of idealism and pragmatism.

As the elected politician, Allan astutely describes Eli's desire to work with him as Eli's "quest to write words that would change people's lives." From Eli's point of view, his motivations are encapsulated in a conversation he had with Allan's father when both he and Allan were embarking on their careers: "I have integrity. I'm always going to give Allan the best benefit of my professional advice, without regard to what I think he might want to hear, or to what is popular, or to what even he wants to do. I will tell him what is right, both from a pragmatic and from an ethical point of view. My biggest motivation is to do the right thing and do a good job."

Michael, the journalist, has a different point of view about the successful professional pairing of Eli and Allan. It is his involvement that provides the suspense that grips the reader from the first pages of the book.

It is worthy to note that because the story unfolds in Montreal and Ottawa, the references are, refreshingly, to Canadian iconography. For example, references to the Governor-General's literary awards, hockey, Don Cherry, Tim Hortons and numerous Canadian historic and literary figures provide the factual and colour background to the story. The cultural and geographic markers in the story are all based on a distinctively Canadian consciousness and sensibility.

But perhaps most gratifying of all is the near sacrosanct place that Goodwin holds for the use of words and the sense of responsibility he feels personally and professionally that writing imposes on the author.

Goodwin recently wrote on one of his blogs: "In many ways, although Sons and Fathers is clearly prose fiction, I see it in part as a bit of a love song to poetry and the role it plays in our lives."

The author has succeeded in combining this literary effort with an exciting political story. ■

On TV: On April 14 VisionTV will be presenting the Canadian premiere of Touched by Auschwitz, a compelling feature-length BBC documentary from producer/director Laurence Rees.

Rees' documentary is not only about the incredible survival stories of six former Auschwitz inmates, but how they dealt with the challenge to rebuild their lives following their liberation.

Among the survivors are a Polish political prisoner who wound up practising as a doctor just 10 minutes away from Auschwitz and a woman survivor who went to Israel where she was not welcomed as expected by the original settlers who had arrived before the war. Max Epstein from Lodz reveals how he was shown 'enormous kindness' by one German soldier in a factory near Auschwitz.

The documentary is part of VisionTV's Holocaust Memorial Week programming to mark the 70th anniversary of the liberation from Auschwitz. April 14 at 9 p.m. and 10 p.m. ET. ■

Mother and son collaborate on play

KATHRYN KATES
SPECIAL TO THE CJN

When a son leaves home, he may not look forward to frequent visits from mom, but that's not the case for award-winning actor of stage, TV and films Jake Epstein.

His mother, multi-award-winning author and playwright Kathy Kacer, came to New York a lot when Epstein was performing on Broadway in Beautiful: The Carole King Story, in order to work on Therefore Choose Life, their first play written together. It took six years to complete.

Presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company (HGJTC), Therefore Choose Life makes its world premiere, April 18 at The Greenwin Theatre at Toronto Centre for the Arts. The two always believed their play would be a perfect fit with the HGJTC and are thrilled about the partnership.

"Therefore Choose Life is a love story about Joseph, who lost his wife in the Second World War and moves to Toronto after the war, remarries and has a son. Then he discovers his first wife has miraculously survived the war and is coming to Toronto to see him," Epstein says. "It's about this man, his second wife, his son, his son's girlfriend and how they all get entangled in this one man's extraordinary dilemma."

Kacer, who's written many books on the Holocaust for young readers, says the play is loosely inspired by a true story.

"Someone told me of a man who survived the camps thinking he lost his first wife, and how she resurfaced many years later, after he had remarried," Kacer says. "I thought of writing it as a book, but something about it appealed to me more written as a play. Jake and I, at the same time, were talking about doing a project together.

"I loved Jake's writing and how he constructed stories, so when I brought him this idea, we both instantly agreed that we would love to give it a try. We wrote the first draft when he was still living at home and between gigs."

Epstein says he was interested in writing about his mom's experience as a second-generation survivor. "My mom tells stories about her parents and other survivors, but I thought her story, as someone who grew up with these stories of survival as a kid, deserves to be told about in the play. The story is about a man who survives the war, but it also tells the story of his son and how he has dealt with that growing up."

Kacer and Epstein worked together well and say the experience never felt hierarchical. To them, it felt collaborative right through, and they said they look forward to working together again.

During the first four months, they worked intensively on a daily basis, planning, creating, writing and rewriting.

"Over the years, as we have been rewriting and rewriting it, we've had to rely on technology to help us along," Kacer says. "We've spent many hours on FaceTime, Skype, and on the telephone sending drafts to one another until we got down to the nitty-gritty and I felt we had to work on it face-to-face, so I went down to New York often."

Jake Epstein

Kathy Kacer

"There was a point after the summer that we had written the first draft, that I felt this could be a writing team that could be effective," Epstein says. "I think we were able to bring something very different to the table from the perspective of two generations in two different worlds.... It makes for three-dimensional characters in the play."

Kacer hopes that Therefore Choose Life will prompt great discussions among the audience.

"The choice the character of Joseph has to make is an extremely painful one. We can imagine people will fall on both sides of his decision, and we want people to be moved and troubled by it. The play is called Therefore Choose Life and is really about choosing what you're passionate about and what moves you, embracing that and moving forward with it.

Epstein feels he's been able to separate being a writer from being an actor. When he's acting, he says he drops the fact that he's written it and any expectations he has about the characters, and lets the play breathe on its own, allowing the actors to bring their own perspectives.

Kacer, who has written a dozen books, all of which focus on stories of World War II and the Holocaust, has a new book coming out this fall called Stones on a Grave, published by Orca Books.

Epstein, best known for playing Craig Manning on Degrassi: The Next Generation, will be seen on Remedy on Global Television and has just completed two films, Borealis and Full Out.

Directed by Rachel Slaven, Therefore Choose Life also includes Lisa Horner, Sheila McCarthy, Amelia Sargisson and HGJTC's co-artistic director, Avery Saltzman. ■

Therefore Choose Life runs April 18-May 10 at The Greenwin Theatre at Toronto Centre for the Arts. For tickets, call 1-855-985-2787 or go online to www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

Exhibit focuses on little-known Jewish history of the Caribbean

SHERI SHEFA
sshefa@thecjn.ca

The Hebrew Congregation of St. Thomas is one of the synagogues featured in the Jewish Treasures of The Caribbean exhibit.

When award-winning photographer Wyatt Gallery, stumbled on an 18th-century synagogue in Curacao in 2009, it opened his eyes to a part of Jewish history that few know about.

"When I was living in Trinidad in 2009, the New York Times was using me as a travel real estate photographer in the Caribbean. They sent me to Curacao and Aruba, and while in Curacao, I stumbled upon a synagogue that I knew nothing about. I was really surprised, as an American Jew, to find out that the oldest synagogue in the Western Hemisphere was in Curacao, in the Caribbean," said Gallery, whose exhibit called Jewish Treasures of the Caribbean is on display at the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum in Toronto until April 24.

The exhibit, sponsored by the American Virgin Islands, features about 40 photographs of Jewish sites that date as far back as the 17th century and serve as the only complete body of professional documentary photographs of all the remaining Sephardi Jewish sites in the Caribbean.

Gallery, 39, who is based in New York but spends about eight months of the year travelling and photographing, said when he entered the Mikve Israel-Emmanuel Synagogue in Curacao, he was taken aback.

"I was really blown away by the beauty of the architecture and the sand-covered floors and old brass chandeliers," he said.

"Out of pure coincidence, the New York Times sent me to two other Caribbean locations that also had this Jewish history. They sent me to Barbados and Suriname to photograph travel stories that had nothing to do with Jewish history, but I would go and spend an extra day to photograph the synagogues."

He said following the 2010 earthquake in Haiti, and photographing the ruins of Haiti's Port-au-Prince Cathedral, he felt it was important to photographically document historical monuments.

"It made me realize that the five remaining historic synagogues in the Caribbean could also easily be ruined. It kind of inspired me to document all the historic Jewish sites so that there are records, and as well to raise awareness about this history and highlight the little-known history, but also inspire people to see the need to preserve these sites in order to preserve the history," he said.

In addition to the five remaining synagogues in the Caribbean, Gallery also photographed a number of Jewish cemeteries that are in disarray due to natural disasters, vandalism and erosion.

"If I could do anything, my goal would be to create some sort of a trust, something people could donate to – proceeds from people purchasing photographs could go toward a trust to help preserve some of these sites," Gallery said.

"The truth is, these Jewish communities in the Caribbean have dwindled substantially. Where there used to be maybe 2,500 people on an island, now there are only 200 or 150. It is difficult for them to maintain the cemeteries and the synagogues unless they have government support. It's really a challenge."

The photos in the Jewish Treasures of The Caribbean exhibit – which were taken in Barbados, Curaçao, Jamaica, Nevis, St. Croix, St. Thomas, St. Maarten, St. Eustatius and Suriname – will be featured in a photography book that will be released next spring.

"It would be a coffee table-style photography book with detailed captions and some history, so that you can first get excited and intrigued by the photos and also get all the history and information you need about it."

To view the photos from the exhibit, visit Gallery's website, at www.wyattgallery.com. ■

Ask Ella

Manage expectations in your own mind first

Ella Burakowski
ellacjn@gmail.com

Dear Ella,

I've been dating Mike for a few months. We get along famously and are growing closer all the time.

Mike seems to have a disturbingly disproportionate number of female friends. He doesn't hide them from me, but it nevertheless raises a red flag for me.

I don't want to be that jealous girlfriend, but I guess I am. I would prefer to be the only woman in his life. I don't feel comfortable asking him to give up all his female friends yet. I'm afraid he will see a side of me that he won't like.

How should I approach this?

Too Many Women

Dear Too Many Women

Jealousy is a powerful emotion and can make you miserable. It's perceiving a normal circumstance as a potentially damaging one. It can ruin a relationship that would otherwise be fine.

The bigger picture is one of trust, respect and love, the three basic must-haves for a successful union to flourish. Examine your relationship with Mike. Think long and hard about each of these traits. Do they exist? Other than having many female friends who existed before you walked into his life, has Mike given you any reason to mistrust him?

If the answer to that is no, then you have to turn the mirror to yourself. Why are you jealous when there is no reason to be? Jealousy can stem from a past experience – for example, if someone has cheated on you. Or it could be because you feel inadequate or insecure. If that's the case, you need to be mindful of your feelings and find a way to control them.

You say Mike and you are growing closer. You also mentioned that he doesn't hide his friendships from you. Work with that. Rather than putting restrictions on his friendships, maybe get to know some of these women a little better. He would probably be open to your meeting people who are important in his life. Try to be open minded about his life prior to your becoming part of it. If you force him to give up people who are important to him, he may end up resenting you.

Two lives coming together to form one bond takes work. It is not always easy or automatic, but if you keep the lines of communication open at all times, the rest will work itself out.

Dear Ella,

After a few years of dating, I met Sonia. We have much in common, and both of us are divorced with kids. We share the same family values, are very involved with our children and enjoy having fun both alone and with our kids. However, I'm afraid of the financial commitment that may be expected of me down the road. I work very hard and am still raising my own family. I have extra financial obligations because of the divorce, and the thought of having to support children who are not my own is far from appealing.

I don't know if it's appropriate to approach the subject and get it out of the way. Sonia has made no financial demands on me, but I know it's just around the corner.

What's Mine is Mine

Dear What's Mine is Mine

It's nice that you've made a connection with someone who makes you happy, but I'm not clear on why you feel the financial burden of Sonia's children will fall on your shoulders. Sonia has raised her children without your help till now. She must have some kind of income and chances are she receives child support from her ex as well.

Right now you are simply in the "getting to know you" phase of your relationship. Putting up road blocks is not a great way to start. First, see if there is something developing between you.

As you are both parents, you must be able to respect each other's choices when it comes to the children. You will both do what's best for the kids first.

Chances of finding a soul mate with no history are slim. You have to grow and learn about each other and decide what you can and can't accept. Relax and enjoy each other's company for now. If you're meant to be together, you'll work out those financial details in time. ■

Rabbi Ilan Acoca wonders why many Jewish holidays revolve around the number seven Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl finds a common thread uniting the songs of Passover Rabbi Catharine Clark explores the theme of infinite gratitude found in Dayeinu

Rabbi Ilan Acoca

We're all familiar with the historical reason for celebrating the seventh day of Passover, for, according to the midrash, the miracle of the splitting of the Red Sea took place seven days after the Israelites left Egypt.

Yet, to our surprise, that reason never appears in the Chumash. In fact, the Torah simply commands that we eat matzah for seven days, then make a special celebration on that last day, without explaining why (Shmot 13:3-7).

In regard to other Jewish holidays, seven also seems to be a "magic" number. Not only is Pesach seven days, we also count seven weeks to Shavuot, then in the seventh month, we celebrate several holidays, including the seven-day holiday of Sukkot!

So why do so many holidays revolve around the number seven? Is it simply because there are seven days in a week?

Jewish tradition teaches us that the number seven is the divine number of completion. When God created the world, the completion of the task happened on the seventh day.

Our sages compare the Nation of Israel's slavery to a rough diamond that is being refined. It takes time to get to the point of having a beautiful diamond, but the hard work is worth it. The Israelites had to go through long and hard slavery in Egypt in order to refine themselves and get to the point of being freed.

God chose to free them on the seventh day to remind them that the number seven represents completion, thus the Nation of Israel reached the point of completion.

I believe the reason God did not reveal this in the Torah was because completion is something personal. Often, life is challenging, and it's up to us to go through the challenge and reach the point of completion.

May God give us the guidance to always get to the point of completion in our lives.

Chag Samayach! ■

There are four types of songs associated with Passover. The seder songs are playful melodies sung with gusto. The psalms of Hallel, chanted during the seder and each morning, are poems of praise and thanksgiving. The Song of the Sea, read on the seventh day of Pesach, recalls the redemptive crossing of the Sea of Reeds. The Song of Songs, descanted on the Shabbat of the festival, celebrates the love of youth and the Land of Israel. What unites these songs?

While some of the seder songs refer to the Exodus, others devote attention to and articulate a yearning for the future redemption of the people of Israel and the building of the Temple. Quite appropriately, the evening commemorating the Exodus culminates in the prayerful hope, "Next Year in Jerusalem."

The six Hallel psalms (113-118) also do more than recall the Exodus. They speak of joyfully entering Jerusalem, bringing offerings to God. "I will offer to you a thanksgiving sacrifice and call on the name of the Eternal... in your midst, O Jerusalem."

According to Torah tradition, the crossing of the Sea of Reeds corresponds with the seventh day of Pesach. In addition to praising God for the miraculous deliverance then, Shirat Hayam speaks of God's care throughout the journey from Egypt to the Land of Promise and extols God for successfully building the Divine sanctuary, the Temple.

Shir Hashirim, a dialogical song of two lovers, is read allegorically by our rabbis to refer to the relationship between God and the people of Israel. The Song of Songs is replete with images of spring in the Land of Israel with references to the daughters of Jerusalem who serve as witnesses to the ardour of the two lovers.

These four songs remind us of the singularity of the Land of Israel. They indicate that the Passover Exodus was not simply intended for liberation from Egypt. It was to direct our people to the Land of Promise. ■

On the seventh day of Passover, the Torah reading includes Shirat Hayam. The Song of the Sea is part of the Torah's best drama. The Israelites are trapped between the Sea of Reeds and Pharaoh's charioteers. Perhaps the Israelites have been delivered from slavery in Egypt only to die so close to the land of their oppression and so far from the Promised Land. Moses holds out his arm over the sea, and the Israelites cross safely to the other side while the Lord destroys the Egyptian army. The Israelites express their gratitude by singing Shirat Hayam.

If it were a Broadway musical, the story would end there. But this is Torah, and the reading for the day continues. The Israelites trek to the wilderness of Shur. Three days pass, and they have found no water. They arrive at the well in Marah, but the water is bitter. The Israelites complain to Moses, saying, "What shall we drink?" What a reverse from the gratitude they expressed when they sang Shirat Hayam.

The epilogue of this Torah reading is a telling contrast to another great Passover song. Only a few days before we sang Dayeinu at seder. We declared over and over that it would have been enough if God had delivered only intermediate steps in the Israelites' salvation. By all rules of logic, these statements are not true. If God had only split the sea for the Israelites but not led them through to dry land, they would have died. If God had sunk the Egyptians but not provided manna for the Israelites in the desert, they would have died.

Yet we declare at seder that each step on its own would have been enough. Shirat Hayam is followed in the Torah reading by complaint. Each line of Dayeinu is a statement of infinite gratitude. May the spirit of Dayeinu be the attitude with which we approach each day. ■
